Harvesting and Stacking Grain.

Of the various machines and implements used on the farm, there is none so delicate and complicated, or requiring the exercise of more skill and ingenuity on the part of the operator, than the self-binding harvester. The standard machines of to-day are the result of a long and thorough course of development and improvement. The saying "Care makes luck" will apply to running a binder if to anything; if the parts get out of order don't lose your head over it, but deliberately set about to repair the break or straighten out the difficulty. Poor twine is responsible for much fussing in the harvest field. It is nearly impossible to do good, even work with poor, uneven twine. The best twine is pure manilla; but so much so-called manilla is poor manilla, that much of the good, even grade, new, white sisal is as satisfactory. As machines become old they usually prefer a coarser grade of twine than in their younger days. Good reeling is indispensable to square, well-formed bundles. The reel should not run parallel with sickle, but the outer end should stand several inches forward in order to place grain upon platform with butts in advance of heads, as the butts are always retarded by coming in contact with the falling grain. In standing grain, the machine should run about level. It takes but a moment when starting up a grade to tilt the machine forward, and vice versa. It should be so well balanced that the tongue will play on the neck yoke much of the time. It is cheaper and more humane to carry the machine on its wheels than on the horses' necks. It should, therefore, be tilted back when the driver leaves his seat; if it stands long the binder may be shifted back also.—Farm and Home.

BADLY FORMED BUNDLE.

WELL-FORMED BUNDLE.

Machinery vs. Hired Help.

Farm work is now everywhere done with much less manual labor than used to be the fact before labor saving machinery was invented. One man will now do the labor of four or five, and will also generally do it better. Even if it were not so, the difficulty of securing sufficient help would make the machinery necessary. It is not certain either that the better care given improved implements on small Eastern farms does not make their use pay as well as it does on the large farms of the far West. Almost all Eastern farmers house their farm implements when they are not in use. Even the grain is not put under shelter in the West, but is rushed from the field to elevators and stored there. The lack of buildings to shelter improved implements at the West makes their working life much shorter than it ought to be.—American Cultivator.

Post and Roof Staging.

The post staging b is easily put up, firm to walk upon and readily taken down. If there are windows where the staging comes, nail to each side of the casing. For putting on the shingles, a will be found convenient and will not injure the shingles already put on. It is made by nailing three shingles to a 2x4 or 3x4 scantling; c is a line used in putting on the shingles.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Capital in Farming.

The great drawback to good farming is lack of capital. A farmer should have a cash capital of $10 for every acre he farms, and a trucker or gardener $20 per acre, at least. With a working capital of several hundred dollars, advantage can be taken of the labor, feed and fertilizer market, and in a monthly outlay of from $300 to $400 a saving of from $15 to $25 can often be made, which will pay the wages of one man for a month. Farmers should be able to get money as low as 3 per cent., as their security is ample.

Irrigation on the Farm.

In laying out a system of ditches for irrigation purposes good care and time should be observed. Ditch lines should be run as much as possible on the high parts of the farm, and the grade should be light, about four feet to the mile being about what ordinary soils will best stand. The ditch should always be larger than is apparently necessary. Both ditch and bank should be built broad, and particular care given to prevent the liability of a little stream of water starting and cutting away both ditch and bank and inundating the field.

A Rustic Plant Stand.

To utilize a stand of Nature's own fashioning, common tree limbs can be used. A section of an apple tree, gnarled and crooked, is picturesque and suitable. It may be placed at the intersection of walks and made useful by holding plants in large vases, or a basket containing trailing plants looks well placed upon it. Set firmly in the ground, as it is intended to be stationary.

LAWN PLANT STAND.

Muck Overestimated.

Many people still think that black, mucky soil must necessarily be very rich. But the fact that it remains without fermentation shows either that it has little nitrogenous value, or that it is so saturated with water that it has become sour. Yet we have known many city people buy black muck from swamps to pot flowers in, and pay 25 cents to 50 cents per bushel basket for it, when dry earth from the side of the road, with much less vegetable matter, would be much better. Most muck, especially from swamps, lacks mineral fertility. It is easy to handle and to work in, and this is what makes it popular. But it needs both ammonia and potash to give the best results.

Comfort for Cows in Summer.

It is the interest of the dairyman to keep his cows at all times as comfortable as possible. This means the contented chewing of the cud, which the cow will do after her work of filling her stomach during the first hour of pasture in the morning. But how can a cow do this? It is impossible while she lies exposed to hot sunlight and the attacks of flies. Since the horn fly has become widely prevalent, summer stabling of cows in a dark, cool stable is more necessary during the middle of the day than it ever was before. No amount of feed will keep a cow to her milk when she is exposed all day without shade to broiling sun and is tormented by flies.

Calf's Drinking Pail.

Calves during the first summer are frequently pastured in an orchard or tethered by a rope near the barn. In either case water must be carried to them and their pail is very likely to be tipped over. Make a frame with spreading legs, like that shown in the cut—just large enough for the pail to set inside—and no trouble will be experienced.—American Agriculturist.

PAIL FOR THE CALF.

Tobacco Plants.

To have stout, stocky plants, the beds should be kept free from weeds, and, if they too thick in a row, thin them out. The small plants can be transplanted and, if shaded for a few days, will soon take root. If the plants are small and yellow, sow a little phosphate between the rows and work it in with a rake. If the ground is dry, water it. The phosphate will make the plants grow vigorously. Aim to grow none but strong, stout plants.

Working Implements.

Hand work will not pay. Let the horses do the work. A steel harrow and a good sulky cultivator will work the corn, potato and vegetable crops at one-third the cost, and work them far better.

Farm Notes.

Do not let up on the cultivation until the crop is made.

Cleaning up the farm will add materially to its value.

Convert cheap grain into meat before sending it to market.

To grow good wool keep sheep in a uniformly thrifty condition.

When the cultivation is finished put the cultivator under shelter.

The good farmer is known by his clean farm and thrifty stock.

Growing a crop of clover will add to the store of nitrogen in the soil.

Feed to make the greatest size in the shortest time at the lowest cost.

Good pastures may be considered the foundation of successful farming.

Old sheep should be fattened and marketed while pasturage is good.

The marketing of the products in the best condition is where the profits lie.

An advantage in keeping stock in a good condition is that it is always salable.

JOSEPH'S CANAL IN EGYPT.

An Engineering Work Still Used Though Built 4,000 Years Ago.

How many of the engineering works of the nineteenth century will there be in existence in the year 6000? Very few, we fear, and still less those that will continue in that far-off age to serve a useful purpose. Yet there is at least one great undertaking conceived and executed by an engineer which during the space of 4,000 years has never ceased its office, on which the life of a fertile province absolutely depends to-day. We refer to the Bahr Joussuf—the canal of Joseph—built, according to tradition, by the son of Jacob, and which constitutes not the least of the many blessings he conferred on Egypt during the years of his prosperous rule.

This canal took its rise from the Nile at Aisut, and ran almost parallel with it for nearly 250 miles, creeping along under the western cliffs of the Nile Valley, with many a bend and winding, until at length it gained an eminence, as compared with the river bed, which enabled it to turn westward through a narrow pass and enter a district which was otherwise shut off from the fertilizing floods on which all vegetation in Egypt depends. The northern end stood seventeen feet above low Nile, while at the southern end it was at an equal elevation with the river. Through this cut ran a perennial stream, which watered a province named the Fayoum, endowing it with fertility and supporting a large population. In the time of the annual flood a great part of the canal was under water, and then the river's current would rush in a more direct course into the pass, carrying with it the rich silt which takes the place of manure and keeps the soil in a constant state of productiveness. All this, with the exception of the tradition that Joseph built it, can be verified to-day and it not mere supposition or rumor.

Until eight years ago it was firmly believed that the design has always been limited to an irrigation scheme, larger, no doubt, than that now in operation, as shown by the traces of abandoned canals, and by the slow aggregation of waste water which had accumulated in the Birket el Querum, but still essentially the same in character. Many accounts have been written by Greek and Roman historians, such as Herodotus, Strabo, Mutianus and Pliny, and repeated in monkish legends, or portrayed in the maps of the middle ages, which agreed with the folklore of the district. These tales explained that the canal dug by the ancient Israelites served to carry the surplus waters of the Nile into an extensive lake lying south of the Fayoum, and so large that it not only modified the climate, tempering the arid winds of the desert and converting them into the balmy airs which nourished the vines and the olives into a fullness and fragrance unknown to any part of the country, but also added to the food supply of the land such immense quantities of fish that the royal prerogative of the right of piscary at the great weir was valued at £250,000 annually. This lake was said to be 450 miles round and to be navigated by a fleet of vessels, and the whole circumference was the scene of industry and prosperity.—Engineering.

Testing Cement.

The tensile strength of cement is now tested accurately by a machine of peculiar construction in possession of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston. The cement to be tested is cast in special molds, which fit into two sockets, so that no clamping or binding is required, the size of the cement between the sockets, where the strain is applied, being one inch square, the size generally adopted for making tests of this material. The upper socket is fixed, and the pull is applied to the lower one by a gear and screw; and, as the time at which the cement breaks is of importance, the power is applied at a uniform rate of 400 pounds a minute. A feature in which this machine is preferable to any other is the absence of all jarring. The weight is applied by a small wheel, which runs along the weighing beam and is connected to a small slide running along an upper beam, which is fixed, on which is the scale of weights which shows what power is being applied. It is thus possible to shift the weight without causing the slightest jar or pull on the weighing beam, while the latter never strikes the frame, as it is held by the wheel.

Sharp Scotchman.

The Scottish American tells a story of a cobbler who was sentenced by a Scottish magistrate to pay a fine of half a crown, or, in default, twenty-four hours' hard labor. If he chose the latter he would be taken to the jail at Perth. "Then I'll go to Perth," he said, "for I have some business there." An official conveyed him to Perth, but when the cobbler reached the jail he said he would pay the fine. The Governor found he would have to take it. "And now," said the cobbler, "I want my fare home." The Governor demurred, but discovered there was no alternative; the prisoner must be sent at the public expense to the place he had been brought from.

MORE SOLID THAN ROCK.

A New Plan to Use Iron in Fort Walls.

The interest manifested in coast defenses will be greatly enhanced when the full scope of the possibilities of the use of iron in fort construction is fully considered. It is claimed by the inventor of the new method, Mr. James Acton Miller, of New Haven, Conn., that forts can be constructed by this means, practically indestructible, and at a small part of the present cost.

A writer in the Army and Navy Journal says that ordinary plate armor, requiring supporting structures, is not to be considered for a moment on account of cost, but in defenses of the nature here described, the fort is made directly where it is to be used, and with a very simple plant.

One very important feature of this invention is the fact that almost any kind of metal that can be melted may be used as it is a well-known fact that mixtures of scrap iron run in ordinary foundry practice makes a very hard casting, and this is to be desired, and it is thought by the inventor that only a small part of new metal will be required for casting the body walls of forts, and, for that matter, where great haste is required, not sufficient time to procure new material, the entire fort can be made out of old material by simply setting up plates of any thickness that may be got hold of conveniently a sufficient distance apart to keep the desired thickness of the wall, and these plates can be bolted together by means of running long bolts through iron pipes cut off the proper length to hold the plates apart, and the intervening space between the plates can be filled loosely by old wire, long pieces of scrap iron, old pipes, rails, etc., or anything that can be secured of the wrought metal kind, then by banking up outside of the plates above mentioned, the cast metal may be run between the same, so as to form a solid wall re-enforced with the wrought metal before mentioned.

This construction is not recommended by the inventor, but is simply mentioned showing the innumerable ways of utilizing tin scraps, old cans, hoop skirts, if they should ever come in fashion again ,and, in fact, almost anything of the metal kind, either fusible or not, in this manner of fort building, but it is the intention of this article to describe the regular construction of this class of forts as above referred to. It is necessary to have a proper substructure, and it is thought better to provide a foundation for the walls at a sufficient depth below the ground to avoid any possibility of projectiles piercing below the iron walls, and to guard against this it might be well to cast a wall of iron, a few feet outside of the regular wall, with a view of making it a stop for projectiles that might strike into the embankment around the fort or the ground surrounding the foundation, and under this head it is thought better to cast a number of walls formed largely of this scrap material, cast so as to deflect the projectile downward, and it will be seen that when the outer wall is struck by a low shot the projectile will be deflected downward and the force weakened; this increases as it comes through a bed of sand to the next wall, which increases the deflection, until its force is spent.

After the foundation is provided it is desirable to cast a floor right where it is to be used, having supports of brick, stone or iron work, in addition to the regular ground formation under the floor, and providing for tracks for handling the guns, ammunition, etc., inside the fort, also for pillars to support the overhead roof where required.

The material recommended for use as a superstructure is I channel and T beams, and these are cut in lengths and used either straight or bent, as the shape of the iron work demands, first having the web punched through with large holes, say three inches in diameter, to allow the cast metal to interlock when run through the framework of the fort, but before the superstructure is put in place all wrought parts around which metal is to be run should be tinned, so that the cast iron will be united with the beams in such manner as to be practically inseparable, as it is a well-known fact that the use of tin with cast iron hardens and toughens the same by chemical action so as to make it almost an impossibility to drill or break the casting.

Not Unlucky.

The London Mail tells a good story about cycles made to sell and not to run.

A well-known woman of title had several times had a man from the cycle-maker's to execute various repairs to her machine—repairs which were necessary on account of the firm's careless workmanship. Her ladyship's little girl happened to be watching the work with great interest, and remarked to the mechanic:

"Don't you think mamma's very unlucky with her bike?"

"Unlucky, did yer say?" was the man's reply. "Why, her ladyship's alive still, ain't she? Well, some of our customers ain't."

Unkind.

"In the last act," said the hamfat star, "where I am supposed to jump from the roof of the castle, they throw a stuffed man over instead.'

"That's strange," commented the very low comedian. "I thought after witnessing the show that a stuffed man went through your part and that you made the jump."—Philadelphia North American.

HOUSE ON WHEELS.

Curious Vehicle in Which Jonathan Olson Will Go Around the World.

An ingenious citizen of Altoona, Pa., has built an elaborate wagon for himself and family, in which he proposes to make a trip around the world. His name is Jonathan Olson, and he intends to start on his long journey this summer, and to finish if possible by the first of June, 1899. He will first go to Illinois, and then strike south to Texas. Voyaging across the Gulf of Mexico to South America, he will take a steamer thence to Spain. From this point the American travelers will start on their long wagon trip.

In fitting out his house on wheels Olson has shown rare taste. He has finished the inside in polished maple, and has adorned it with hand carvings of his own design. In the course of an eccentric life he has picked up many beautiful pieces of bric-a-brac, which he now turns to the adornment of his wagon house. The interior of the house, besides having three rooms, is well conceived in point of convenience. In one room the family cook, and in bad weather they dine there also. But the dining room is out of doors when the wagon can be pulled up in a pleasant place. Five days out of the week there is a halt, where the cloth can be spread under the trees and a good cool drink obtained from a spring.

The second room has a couch and small table. The table can be used for a breakfast tray or it can be cleared at night and used for parlor games. It also does duty as writing table, or for books and a smoking set. On one side of the room there is a dressing table that takes up the entire wall. It has twenty drawers, a broad shelf and a mirror with shelves overhead. Here the entire winter and summer wardrobe is stored.

In pleasant weather there is no sleeping done in the house. Hammocks are slung under trees and the family "camps out." The third room is a general store room. Here the hammocks are kept, and here chairs are stored and tables piled up. Anything that is wanted can be brought from the storeroom at a minute's notice. There is one chest devoted to dress goods, calico, bunting, denim and useful articles for wear and for fancy work. The wagon can stop at a town any time to replenish supplies, but the owner plans it so carefully that, except for food, there need be no halt for a month at a time.

Provisions are purchased of the farmers, who, it is expected, will supply butter, eggs, vegetables and chickens cheap in return for the privilege of looking through the novel house. The kitchen is one of the best rooms of all, for it is arranged ship-shape. Cups are hung from hooks and plates set in little grooves. Pans are on the walls, and everything is polished bright.

The floors are plain boards, laid nicely and oiled, so that the rooms look as neat as those in any house. "The cabin" or living room has the look of a stateroom on a yacht, and this effect is heightened by some very clever wall decorations made from simple pieces of wood skillfully inlaid. The most ingenious arrangement of all is a sliding door, by which the whole side of the "house" can be opened. The doors slide to one side, and finally come completely off the runners. They can be taken off and laid under the cart or used for tables under the trees.

Olson will travel with three horses, often resting one by hitching it to the back of the cart. When the wagon is closed it does not look like any other wagon. It is longer and broader, and there is an air of mystery about its curtained windows. The wagon is heavily built and finished with the best of wheels and axles.—New York Journal.

JOHN OLSON'S COTTAGE CAB.

A CITY IN A VOLCANO.

The Picturesque and Peculiar City of Saba, in the West Indies.

If you will take down your geographies and look on the map of the West Indies, you will notice, between the islands of Santa Cruz and St. Christopher, two small islets which, unless your map is an unusually large and complete one, will have no names given. These two islands belong to the Dutch, and the most northerly and westerly of them is called Saba.

The Dutch are noted for their odd and quaint customs and for their perseverance, Holland being sometimes called the "Land of Pluck;" but I doubt if anywhere in all their possessions have these curious people shown their queer and eccentric habits to greater advantage than in the little out-of-the way island of Saba.

The island is small, its greatest diameter being not over two and one-half miles, and it is nothing more than an isolated mountain-top rising out of the sea. The sides are very steep and high, rising in places for a sheer 2,000 feet. There is no harbor, no beach, no safe anchorage, and no large trees on the island. Although Saba has a population of over 2,500, yet you might sail all around it without seeing any signs of houses or settlements. If you wished to land, or "go aboard," as the Sabans say, you would have to do so on a shelving rock on the southern side of the island; and here you would find a steep, winding flight of stone steps leading up the rocky mountain side.

Following these steps, which number 800 and are called "The Ladder," you at last reach the top of the mountain, and looking inland, see a small grassy plain covered with neat white, red-roofed houses, the whole surrounded on every side by towering peaks and precipices covered with beautiful tree-ferns, bamboos, and wild plantains. This little town, the only one on the island, is known as "The Bottom"—a curious name, surely; but it is well named, nevertheless, for the plain on which it is built is nothing more than the bottom of the crater of an extinct volcano.

Descending the slope into this queerest of queer towns, you find the streets simply narrow paths walled with stone, higher in places than your head, while every inch of earth is cultivated with true Dutch thrift and industry. Here and there small patches of sugar-cane, yams and arrowroot are side by side with beans, corn and potatoes, with palm and banana trees rising over all. The population consists of whites and negroes in nearly equal numbers, while the blue-eyed and tow-headed children play with black-skinned and curly-haired piccaninnies; but all are Dutch in speech, manners and looks. The houses, shops, gardens—everything is Dutch.—St. Nicholas.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, EDITOR, ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 20 1897

"From a military as well as a commercial point of view," says Director Smith of the Bureau of American Republics, "the Hawaiian Islands, owing to their location, are of great importance. Haiwaii may be said to lie but one-third the distance of the accustomed route from San Francisco to Japan and Chinese ports, from San Francisco to Australia, from the ports of British Columbia to Australia and British India, and about half way from the Isthmus of Panama to Yokohama and Hongkong. The construction of a ship canal across the isthmus would extend this geographical relation to the ports of the Gulf of Mexico and of the Atlantic seaboard of North and South America. A glance at the map will at once make clear the fact that no other point in the North Pacific has such a dominating relation to the trade between America and Asia as a place for coaling and a depot of supplies for vessels.

"From a naval standpoint Haiwaii is the great strategic base of the Pacific. Under the present conditions of naval warfare created by the use of steam as a motive power, Haiwaii would secure to the maratime nation possessing it an advantage as a depot for the supply of coal. Modern battleships, depending absolutely upon coal, would be enabled to avail themselves of their full capacity of speed and energy only by having some halfway station in the Pacific where they could replenish their stores and refit. A battleship or cruiser starting from an Asiatic or Australian port, with the view of operating along the coast of either North America or South America, would be unable to act effectively for any length of time at the end of so long a voyage, unless she were able to refill her bunkers at some point on the way.

"On the other hand, if the United States possessed Haiwaii, she would be able to advance her line of defense 2000 miles from the Pacific coast, and with a fortified harbor and a strong fleet at Honolulu, would be in a position to conduct either defensive or offensive operations in the North Pacific to greater advantage than any other power."

It costs the Government now just 5 cents for 1000 stamps, delivered anywhere in the United States. One thousand 2-cent stamps are sold for $20. It will thus be seen that Uncle Sam has a trust worth having, and that his profits are not to be despised, even by a bloated bondholder. In fact, Uncle Sam is envied so much by other capitalists that frequently other parties start into tha business of printing stamps, without first securing a license or even trying to get one. Sometimes the secret service office catches the guilty parties, but in case due discretion is exercised the counterfeiting of stamps is not very difficult, as little close attention is bestowed upon them in the mails. But the expense is so great and the returns so small that the counterfeiters do not linger long at a stamp job. During a single year the Bureau of Printing and Engraving prints about $80,000,000 worth of stamps. This is over an average of $1 per head for every inhabitant of the United States, and indicates that we are a great race of letter writers, assuming that each person writes one letter a week. All people who write letters, however, are not thoughtful enough to prepay them. Some idea of the number of delinquent correspondents who like to send their letters postage due may be obtainsd from the fact that during the last fiscal year the value of the postage due stamps affixed to letters without sufficient postage aggregated $450,658, mostly in 1 and 2-cent stamps.

By and by we shall have national text books for the schools. Every public school in the United States will have the same text books. The education of Americans will be American, and the children in one part of the country or other will not be subject to the whims of petty pedagogues or to the schemes of boodlers. The greatest minds of the country will unite upon the compilation of a national series of text books and they will be free to the pupils' parents and paid for out of the general taxation. Then the text book question will be solved, and constantly recurring confusion and scandal in the States will come to an end.

It is proposed that the Regents of the State University help the State Printing Office out of its difficulty by advancing it funds. Governor Budd, who vetoed the appropriation for the printing office, causing all the trouble, is a member of the Board of Regents, but that body may not be influenced by his action. The salaries of 7000 school teachers in this State cannot be legally paid until provided for through registers that must be printed at the State Printing Office, and the necessity for operating this establishment is obvious. The University has the money to spare, and if the loan can be lawfully made it should be forthcomtng.

The latest water scheme developed in Southern California is an effort to have Tulare Lake set apart by the Federal Government for the purpose of an irrigation reservoir. To insure a perpetual supply it is proposed to construct a canal from the San Joaquin, which will drain the flood waters of that stream into the lake. A deep channel will be cut from the deep water in the lake to a point where it touches the Coast range hills, where the water will be pumped upon the high ground and from there distributed over the vast plains lying to the north.

SOME RECENT DECISIONS.

Among recent decisions of the courts of the land that are reported as of more than usual interest, we notice one by a Georgia tribunal to the effect that the law regarding cruelty to children is inapplicable to a case where the boy is almost as large as his father but not quite as strong, but who had attained the stature and physical strength of manhood.

In North Dakota it has recently been held by the Supreme Court that where a defendant in a criminal case takes the witness stand in his own behalf he is subject to the same rules of cross-examination that govern other witnesses, and may be required to answer any relevant and proper question that will tend to convict him of the crime for which he is being tried, even though it may also tend to convict him of some collateral crime.

In New York a tender was made to a street car conductor of a $5 bill for a fare due. The rules of the company operating the road limit the amount of a bill that may be changed by a conductor to $2. The Appellate Court held that the tender of the $5 bill was not reasonable and the conductor cannot be required to furnish change for that amount.

In Iowa the Supreme Court has held that the right of a bank to set off the unmatured note of an insolvent depositor against the deposit is superior to the rights of a drawee of the check on the deposit, of which the bank had no notice until after it learned of the depositor's insolvency.

In Michigan there is confusion of opinion respecting the negotiability of a note secured by a mortgage. It is held by two of the Judges that a provision in a mortgage securing a note which is otherwise negotiable, to the effect that a mortgage shall pay taxes and assessments, on failure of which the whole debt shall become due, destroys the negotiability of the note; while in another case a similar provision is declared by other Judges not to defeat the negotiability of the note. In neither case was there a clear majority of the court in favor of either proposition.

In Louisiana it is held that an insurance company which under its contract elects to repair and fails to do so is liable for the cost of the repairs without reference to the amount of the insurance, if the assured completes the repairs, which is so sensible and obvious a proposition the wonder is it was contested by the insurance company.

In Illinois applying the doctrine that a loss or injury is due to the act of God where it is occasioned exclusively by natural causes such as could not be prevented by human care, skill and foresight, it is held that an unprecedented flood by reason of which the baggage of a passenger is swept away is an act of God; but that where unnessary delay of a carrier made the loss of the property by such flood possible the carrier is liable.—Sac. Record-Union.

Senator Perkins and others who are interested in the carrying and trading interests of the coast are much displeased at what they term the apparent inclination of Secretary Gage of the Treasury Department to let the Canadians run the United States Government. The news that the Secretary has ordered that Canadian steamers be allowed to discharge at Skaguay as well as at Dyea is the latest cause for dissatisfaction with his policy. It is insisted that this course of proceeding tends to give the Canadian shippers all the advantage over those south of the line, and this Senator Perkins declares to be wholly uncalled for in view, particularly, of the fact that the Dominion authorities have never granted Americans any favors, but have rather seized on every opportunity to handfcap them in their enterprises.

At a recent rally of the Christian Alliance, at Old Orchard, Me., $65.000 in cash was contributed for the support of missionaries in foreign parts, which would seem to negative the reports that there are starvation and other forms of distress among Americans in Eastern cities, to say nothing about the Huns, Finns and others in the mining regions. It cannot be so that Americans are suffering for the necessities of life when Americans contribute $65,000 in cash and $20,000 in jewelry, at one collection, for missionary work in China. India and Africa.—S. F. Report.

The glowing accounts which have come down from old Trinity have not been exagerated. Carter, the miner left in charge of the Graves Bros.' property on Morrison gulch, has taken out $22,000 more gold after the brothers landed at the Bay with the $42 000 nuggets. Parties who know the country express no surprise, and say that they have always known that the mines of that section were rich. Seams and pockets are sometimes hard to find, but always produce good rssults.

The tide of immigration is at the lowest point since the general government assumed jurisdiction of the subject in 1882. The number of arrivals from all countries, according to treasury statistics during the last fiscal year was 231,832, a decrease as compared with the previous year of 212,435. The lightest immigration of any previous year was in 1895, when the number from all countries was 279,848.

Shortridge has relinquished control of the San Francisco Call to one of the Spreckels. They paid $364,000 about two years ago for the plant. It takes millionaires to conduct "modern journalism," but we predict that the sugar element will tire of it before long.

That part of the income of the State University at Berkeley which is received from the State will be increased 100 per cent next February, when the revenues from the additional 1-cent tax become available. The total income from the State will then be $225,000.

The San Francisco Call says that the postoffice site was purchased over four years ago and the work of excavation has just commenced. The time subsequent to the sale of the land has been consumed in "testing" the site, and apparently the Government engineers are not yet satisfied that it will hold up their building. We may safely assume that future tests will consume at least as long a period as the past ones and that when the actual work of construction begins, laying one stone a year—which is the usual rate of progress made on Government buildings—the twentieth century will be well on its way before the building will be finished.

The Western Union Telegraph Company is arranging to string an additional wire from San Francisco to Chicago. The wire will be of copper and of large size. It is proposed to make a record in stringing and having it in working order in a certain stipulated time. It will be over 2,400 miles long and will be ready for use before winter sets in. A largely increasing business on this coast makes the new wire a necessity.

Mr. Huntington's purchase of a large amount of land overlooking the proposed breakwater at San Pedro may mean that Secretary Alger has been directed to go ahead with the work at that point. Of course no Government would move in a little matter like expending a couple of million until Collis got ready.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach has announced to the American Commissioners in London that the British Gsvernment is not yet in a position to reply to the envoys of the United States and the French ambassador on the question of an international agreement on bimetallism.

Hundreds of so-called Klondike mining and development companies in the East are advertising to a credulous public that every man who drops a dollar in the slot will get a stock certificate entitling him to a big gold nugget every day in the week.

The Kansas Populists have decided to make a demand for the abolition of Federal Courts the chief issue of their next campaign, and as a novelty the thing may have quite a run among people who like that sort of politics.

There is a prospect of a mining boom in California this fall that will leave the Klondike out in the cold.

METAL MARKET.

Following are the quotations in New York, August 14:

Bar silver	55
Mexican dollars	44
Tin	13 85
Copper	11.62½
Lead	3.60

Miss Blanche Bunney left yesterday for the State Normal School at San Jose.

Miss Emma Chalfant, of Bishop, is visiting friends at Camp Independence and in town.

Miss May Parker has been quite ill for the past two weeks. Dr. Woodin is in attendance.

Supervisor Fitzgerald and family leave Keeler to-day for Los Angeles, to be absent six weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Webb and Miss Irma Webb arrived home Monday evening, from a summer outing spent at Long Valley.

Sheriff Given got back Wednesday morning from a trip to Ballarat. He says it is extremely hot out there, the mercury registering 115.

Mrs. M. Franks and her little son will arrive at Independence this evening from San Francisco and will spend some time visiting her mother, Mrs. F. Rhine.

There was a brilliant electrical display on the mountains last evening, accompanied by heavy rain, very little of which reached the valley.

The finder of a harness tug or trace on the Mazourka road will confer an honest favor by leaving it at the Independence depot or at this office.

Assayer Hedrick and Fred Edgerton came in from the Reward mine last Tuesday, bringing in Bar No. 49, valued at $1350. A carload of concentrates is being shipped every month.

Apples, peaches, nectarines, grapes, etc., are in abundance and of the finest. "As before stated," the only way to realize on such transient product is to take away its perishable quality—establish a cannery and distribute its sale and consumption all the year round.

Dr. Woodin successfully performed the delicate operation of trephining upon Henry Werner, the miner who had his skull fractured by a blast, at Shepherd's Canyon, as mentioned last week. The injured man was last Monday brought in to the Lacey ranch at Georges Creek, where he is slowly recovering.

A Ballarat correspondent of the Register says: "Quite a number of mines have been experted and some bonded lately. The boys have opened up many claims in the last few weeks, getting them in condition to sell or show." And: "The Comet mine sale was brought to a close the other day for $20,000. This makes the amount of sales made by Mr. Donahue mount up to $90,000."

Supervisor Fitzgerald writes that he has recently visited Tuba Canyon in the Panamint range, and has inspected the mines being worked by a San Francisco company of which Charles W. Morgan is superintendent. He found that at a depth of one hundred and twenty feet one ledge contained twenty feet of pay ore. Mr. Morgan is an experienced miner and feels confident that his company has a good thing.

J. T. Gothard, D. D. S., wife and daughters, of Los Angeles, passed through town on the 14th, en route for Lake Tahoe. They report a delightful visit to the Reward mine, where they were royally entertained by the genial Superintendent, Mr. Hoskins. Mr. Hetrick, the assayer, added to their pleasure by much interesting and valuable information, and Mr. Fred Edgerton, of Chicago, was altogether charming as a guide, beguiling the broiling heat of the upward trail with visions of cool grottos and refreshing creams and ices which were to be the reward of the faithful.

The Big Pine Fight.

During the week posters were tacked up around town announcing that there would be a "fistic carnival" at Big Pine last evening, the main event to be a ten-round go between Al. Bryant of Carson and Heenan McCarrol of Fish Springs. The roped arena was erected in Williams Hall and about 8 o'clock p. m. Ed. and and Frank Ober entered the ring and gave a lively four-round exhibition. The principals in the big event were then introduced. McCarrol was in poor condition, and managed to last a round and a half, when his seconds threw up the sponge. A number of other bouts were had between local boys, in which Volney Goodale showed up to good advantage. It is proposed to arrange an athletic entertainment at Bishop during fair week, which will undoubtedly be quite an attraction.

The License Case.

The sheep license case of the County of Mono vs. Flanigan went to the jury about supper time on Tuesday evening and after supper an unanimous verdict in favor of the defendant was rendered. The jury, we are told, took a vote without any consultation and every vote was for the defendant. The issues in the case were the same as that of the County of Mono against Anderson, which was tried last week and also decided against the county. Plaintiff claimed that Mr. Flanigan was indebted to the county for $551 under an ordinance levying a license tax upon the business of herding, grazing, pasturing and raising sheep. Defendant denied that he was engaged in any such business within the county, and proved to the satisfaction of the jury that he was but driving his sheep from Inyo County, where he had purchased them, across the County of Mono by the most direct and practicable route and with all possible speed to his range near Weber Lake; that the sheep were in transit all the time they were in Mono County. The Court charged the jury in accordance with the ruling of the Supreme Court of this State and of the Superior Courts of other counties having similar ordinances, that if the defendant was in good faith driving his sheep across the County of Mono from a place outside the county to an objective point also beyond the county lines, there to be ranged, and proceeded through the county with all speed by the shortest way, then their verdict must be for the defendant, but that if defendant did not proceed as above stated then the jury should find for the plaintiff. On Wednesday the District Attorney dismissed all of the criminal cases, wherein six herders of Flanigan's and Anderson's sheep, while driving through this county, were arrested for misdemeanor because of their employment in that capacity. The county in this litigation was represented by District Attorney Charles L. Hayes, and the defendant by Wm. O. Parker of Bridgeport and Wm. H. Metson of San Francisco. These cases have been expensive to the county and burdensome upon those subject to jury duty.—Bridgeport Chronicle, Aug. 14.

Preacher or No Preacher, Which?

EDITOR INDEPENDENT—Owing to the poor support of the pastor it has been proposed to take the preacher from Independence and put one at Big Pine, who will come down and give an occasional service in the Independence church.

The question is, shall we close our parsonage and send our preacher to Big Pine?

Will depriving ourselves of regular religious services improve the moral standing of the community?

Will Independence be better without religious privileges than with them?

If you look at it from a business standpoint you must confess that it is best to retain a preacher. The Missionary Society of the M. E. C. has been helping you for years to support your pastor. This money and the money that is raised for him on the charge is spent here.

If you look at it from a moral standpoint, you cannot but confess that a church with a resident pastor is a great restraining influence in a community.

The pastor is interested in the spiritual welfare of the people on his charge, and is always ready to help in any good work, to visit the sick, to comfort the mourner, to officiate at funerals, etc.

To consider this question a meeting is called to meet in the church on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock, August 24th.

All who are interested in church work are cordially invited to be present.

There is no certainty as to whether the present pastor will be returned, but the meeting is to decide whether we shall have a resident pastor in the future.

Come one and all and state your views, so that the secretary can forward your wishes to the Conference.

STEWARD OF M. E. CHURCH.

Another Pioneer Gone.

"Jack has left us" were the words heard about town last Saturday, meaning that John Welch had died. His illness had continued three or four weeks, and from its serious nature his physicians knew that dissolution was inevitable. In future a feature of the register of Inyo County voters will be missed—that of John Welch, who was born "On the Ocean." He came to this Coast from Massachusetts and to Inyo early as 1867, since which time he has been well and favorably known, as in his career as prospector, packer, guide and miner he was under all circumstances possessed of sturdy energy and imperturbable good nature. He was held in high esteem by the officers and men of Camp Independence and especially by Bierstadt, the artist. His coolness and undaunted courage was well shown on several occasions here in town. Once he was hunted for by a man who opened fire with a six-shooter. "Jack" responded rapidly and hit his man in the leg. Sheriff Wm. L. Moore ran intrepidly into the fusillade and arrested both. Jack was promptly released and the man sent to the hospital, from which he soon escaped. Not long after, when the same Sheriff "Dad" Moore was killed by Mike Welch, our John Welch took a hand in the search for Tessier, who originated all the trouble. When Jack hunted down his man and dragged him out of his dark hiding place, gun and all, the people took off their hats to John Welch in gratitude and respect. Of late years the deceased has been mining at Waucoba, Ubehebe and Fish Springs, where his interest in valuable properties may now lie undeveloped indefinitely. He was unmarried and nothing is known of any relatives, but he had many warm friends in Inyo who sincerely regret his loss.

Dr. Woodin was telegraphed for yesterday to go to the Labarge camp in Mazourka Canyon to attend Orrie Johnson, who had been badly hurt. He has not returned and no further particulars are obtainable.

SUPERIOR COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Walter A. Lamar, Judge.

FRIDAY, Aug. 26, 1897.

L. Lasky vs. Ruperto Carrasco et. al—On trial.

Tulare Campers.

A camping party of Tulare people came down to Independence Wednesday, returning yesterday morning. The party consisted of Mr. and Mrs. S. L. N. Ellis and their five children, the oldest fourteen years old, the youngest two; W. P. Builard and F. G. Hill. Another division of the party, Mr. and Mrs. A. Swank, H. D. Woodard and two sons, remained in Onion Valley. The party has been out over a month and has had a glorious time. They have caught over seventeen hundred trout, shot three fine buck-deer and got a number of grouse. It speaks well for our mountain trails when so large a party, including small children, has crossed the summits of the Sierras without accident. Both Mr. Ellis and Mr. Woodard are enthusiastic mountaineers and spend a month or more in the Sierras every summer. They both agree that the Kings River country cannot be beaten for fish, game, and the grandeur of the scenery.

A Woman Shot

Darwin was agitated Wednesday evening over a shooting affair. Mrs. Tabitha Gall was sitting in the kitchen of her residence about half past six in the evening, when she heard a knock on the door. On opening it she was confronted with a pistol in the hands of a Chinaman known as Jim Robinson. She slammed the door shut and held it by pressing against it with her right hand in an elevated position. The Chinaman shot through the door, the bullet taking effect in the right shoulder, coming out through the right breast. Walter Harris, the woman's son, heard the shot and ran around the house and grappled with the Chinaman. In the scuffle the pistol was again discharged, but did no damage. Mrs. Gall was brought to Keeler the same evening and came to Independence yesterday morning. She is weak from loss of blood, but will recover. Sheriff Given left for Darwin yesterday for the purpose of arresting the assailant.

It has been discovered that the rythmic curse over the grave of Shakespeare to the effect that he who disturbs those bones will be pursued by malignant fate is identical in idea with that which King Ashmanezer, ruler of the Sidonians, caused to be engraved on his intended sarcophagus, which was removed from Sidon to Paris. This curse, thousands of years older than that of Shakespeare, did not avail, and the excavating spoilsmen braved the adjuration, which translated runs: "I rest in this tomb in the place which I have built. My adjuration to all the ruling powers and to men is: 'Let no one open this resting place nor trouble me in this resting place by disturbing the couch of my slumbers. For all men who should open this tomb of my rest there shall be no rest with the departed; they shall not be buried in a grave and there shall be to them neither son nor seed; neither root below nor fruit above, nor honor among the living under the sun.'"

A Remarkable Cure of Chronic Diarrhœa.

In 1862, when I served my country as a private in Company A, 167th Pennsylvania Volunteers, I contracted chronic diarrhœa. It has given me a great deal of trouble ever since. I have tried a dozen different medicines and several prominent doctors without any permanent relief. Not long ago a friend sent me a sample bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy, and after that I bought a bottle and took a 50-cent bottle; and now I can say that I am entirely cured. I cannot be thankful enough to you for this great Remedy, and recommend it to all suffering veterans. If in doubt write me. Yours gratefully, HENRY STEINBERGER, Allentown, Pa. Sold by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

It is said that a big deal has been practically consummated by which John W. Mackey will become the owner of the Silver Peak mines, in Esmeralda county, Nevada. A. M. Womble and Geo. D. Roberts left San Francisco for New York on the 14th to close the purchase of the mines, which are conceded to be the best gold properties in that State. For some time it has been involved in litigation, but now all the contests have been compromised.

The Cubans have Havana so closely surrounded that the Spaniards cannot have a dance in the suburbs without being caught in a fight and forced to surrender.

Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy always affords prompt relief. For sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

Stop! Women,

And consider that in addressing Mrs. Pinkham you are confiding your private ills to a woman—a woman whose experience in treating woman's diseases is greater than that of any living physician, male or female.

You can talk freely to a woman when it is revolting to relate your private troubles to a man; besides, a man does not understand, simply because he is a man.

MRS. PINKHAM'S STANDING INVITATION.

Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to promptly communicate with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read, and answered by women only. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman. Thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America which has never been broken. Out of the vast volume of experience which she has to draw from, it is more than possible that she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case. She asks nothing in return except your good will, and her advice has relieved thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.

AGE AND AGE UNITED

TWO ODD OLD PEOPLE MARRIED AT THREESCORE AND TEN.

The Bridegroom Has Lived Seventy-eight Years and Yet Is Swift of Foot and Full of Vigor—His Wife Is Only a Few Years Younger.

There was much wonder in St. Agnes' Roman Catholic church, Paterson, N. J., at the principal service on a recent Sunday morning, when aged William Hill walked down the center aisle with venerable Katharine McGinty, a widow of some means, and it became known that they had been married on the preceding day.

Hill admits that he is 78 years old, and although he claims that his bride is a dozen years younger her crown of snow white hair makes her seem the older of the pair. He is tall and erect, although not in the most robust of health, while she is short and inclined to stoutness.

Hill has been a widower for about two years. He spent all his life's savings in trying to nurse his wife and their daughter back to health. Their deaths left him poor and almost friendless, without a relative in the United States. He has since managed to make ends meet, although his age prevented him from working at his trade of engineer and locomotive blacksmith.

Occasionally he was engaged to do a little work by aged Widow McGinty, who owned some property and was, like himself, without children or relatives. They had known each other for nearly half a century, and the similarity in the lonely circumstances of their old age seemed to draw them together. The friendship was noticed by the widow's neighbors and there were some who shrewdly guessed the truth when the couple started out arm in arm and arrayed in their best clothes. They proceeded to the rectory of St. Agnes' Roman Catholic church and gave the pastor, Rev. Father Corrigan, a surprise when they asked to be married.

But both were in earnest, and their requests had to be granted. They had brought no witnesses or bridal party, and the clergyman called in his housekeeper. The latter was determined to have the ceremony conducted with all proper formality, so she brought the butcher from over the way to attend the bridegroom while she acted as bridesmaid. Both of the contracting parties had been married before, and all went smoothly. They left the rectory as husband and wife.

Hill, when seen at his new home, was surprised to learn that his marriage had been much discussed, as he saw little to remark about it. He declared that he was easily sprier than most men of 60 and was willing to run a foot race to prove it. He talked freely of the reasons for the union, remarking that, of course, marriage at his age was different from weddings of youth. His wife and he would be companions for each other, and that was what they wanted. Besides, each had some of this world's goods, and now that their possessions are joined both can live in comfort. Mrs. McGinty needed a protector, he a companion, and now both needs are filled. Then they could take care of each other in the event of sickness.

"And those are some of the reasons why we hitched up," concluded Mr. Hill.

The couple have unusual mental and physical vigor for such advanced age, and no one could talk with them without realizing the wisdom of their union.—Exchange.

Says Priests May Marry Soon.

A French ecclesiastic has written to the London Times saying that the next great change in the Roman Catholic church will be the repeal of the law of clerical celibacy. The movement, he thinks, might well start in this country, under the lead of Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, but will take time. The present pope will hardly indorse it, nor can the French ecclesiastics take it up just now. When it does come, however, the writer prophesies a large exodus of Anglican clergymen to join the church of Rome.

Forged Her Mother's Name.

Ellen Cadman, the 15-year-old daughter of Mrs. L. A. Cadman of Chattanooga, was arrested recently at the instance of her mother on a charge of forgery. The young lady had cashed checks to the amount of $80 purporting to have been signed by her mother. A friend of the girl, in order to save her from spending the night in the city jail, made up the amount, and she was released. The girl is very handsome and unusually bright for one of her age. The mother and daughter were later reconciled.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Birds' Sea Resort.

Naturalists consider it a wonderful fact that the Bermuda Islands have only seven native species of land birds, while no less than a hundred and twenty-eight other species pay visits to the Islands. Many of these visitors are birds which pass the summer in the United States, and utilize the Bermuda Islands as a convenient winter resort, thus imitating some of their human compatriots. Even some American bats follow the example of the birds by wintering in the Bermudas.

Fighting Bicycles.

Captain Gerard, of the French army, has formed an experimental company of sixty men riding bicycles, and intended for a fighting corps on wheels. The captain has invented a special form of bicycle for his men. The crossbar is hinged, so that the machine can be folded and carried on the back, when ground impracticable for wheeling has to be crossed. It is thought that companies trained to maneuver on wheels may be very useful in light skirmishing and scouting. Each rider carries a Lebel rifle and bayonet.

The March of Mechanical Science.

When the Simplon tunnel is completed the Alps will possess three enormous perforations, each representing a stage in the swift advance of mechanical science. The Mont Cenis tunnel, nearly eight miles long, was constructed about thirty years ago, at the rate of one kilometer—0.62 of a mile—per year, and each kilometer cost $1,200,000. The St. Gotthard tunnel, nine and a quarter miles long, was constructed about ten years later than the Mont Cenis, at the rate of two kilometers a year, and cost $800,000 per kilometer. The Simplon tunnel, twelve and a quarter miles long, will, according to the contract, go forward at the rate of four kilometers a year, and will cost only $600,000 per kilometer.

Globular Lightning.

"Lightning balls" are comparatively rare phenomena, although there are many recorded instances of their appearance during thunder storms. The cause of their formation is more or less a mystery, but some light has been thrown upon it recently by the experiments of Signor Right at Bologna. He has succeeded in producing artificial lightning balls with a powerful Holtz electric machine and a battery of Leyden jars, and has made photographs of them in various stages of their existence. The conditions under which he produces his mimic lightning are: high resistance in the discharging circuit, great capacity in the condenser, and a rarefaction of the air through which the discharge takes place.

Curious Copper Mining.

The United States Consul at Santiago de Cuba reports that about nine miles from that town there are copper mines, having shafts from 900 to 1,200 feet deep, which were regularly worked until 1867, since which time they have been abandoned and have become filled with water, all but 300 feet of their depth being below sea level. But in later years copper was obtained from the drowned mines in an interesting manner. The water with which they are filled holds a considerable quantity of copper in solution, and this water was pumped out into tanks. Scraps of iron were then thrown into it, and the dissolved copper became deposited on the iron. When the deposit grew sufficiently thick it was broken off, and the iron was thrown back into the water to gather a fresh incrustation of the red metal.

Varying Power of X-Rays.

At a recent meeting of the Royal Society in London a description was given of the change that occurs in the penetrative power of the X-rays in proportion as the air is more and more completely exhausted from the vacuum tube in which the rays are produced. At a certain degree of exhaustion the rays penetrate the flesh and show the bones of a human hand in shadow. With a greater exhaustion of air the flesh becomes almost perfectly transparent, while the bones remain opaque. With a still higher degree of exhaustion the rays begin to penetrate the bones; and with the highest vacuum through which the electric discharge will pass, the bones themselves become almost as transparent as the flesh. Similar variations in penetrative power can be produced by increasing or decreasing the power of the current, or by varying the electrical resistance of the tube.

Great Heat in Tunnels.

One of the most difficult problems connected with the construction of the proposed tunnel under the Simplon range in the Alps is that of keeping down the temperature. The deeper we go under the surface of the earth the greater the heat becomes, and since the new tunnel will run not much less than 7,000 feet beneath the summit of Monte Leone, it is anticipated that the temperature will be as high as 104 degrees Fahrenheit. During the digging of the St. Gothard tunnel the temperature rose to 88 degrees. The heat affected the health of the workmen, more than half of whom were attacked by disease. The still more intense heat to be encountered in the Simplon tunnel can only be reduced by a careful system of ventilation.

Gifts to Universities.

The rapid accumulation of large private fortunes is nowhere else so common as in America, because nowhere else are enterprises of such vastness so constantly undertaken from private initiative. The dangers and disadvantages of this tendency have been frequently set forth. The principal compensation lies in the occasional examples of philanthropy on a large scale which is made possible by this concentration of wealth in the hands of individuals.

Not long ago Columbia University made an appeal for four million dollars to erect new buildings. The responses were such as to show that the loyalty and the resources of the friends of the institution had not been overestimated. The University of Chicago, but a few years old, has received gifts to the amount of twelve millions. Harvard, Yale, Princeton and other old institutions record from year to year benefactions running up into the hundreds of thousands. President Eliot, in a recent report, states that within three years Harvard has received nearly six hundred thousand dollars, but that within the same period at least five other universities have had their endowments increased by much larger sums.

The endowment of universities is, of course, but one of the forms which private munificence takes. It is, however, in one respect a particularly wise form. The common schools may depend for their support upon the general feeling that they are necessary. No community can afford to be without them. But the value to the average man of the university is not so palpable. The higher learning is the possession of a few; its benefits reach the great majority indirectly through the advance of science and the increase of knowledge.

The university, therefore, cannot count upon an effective popular support. In all ages it has had to rely very largely on the patronage of the very rich. The great English universities have owed their strength to kings and earls and bishops. In America the place of these titled givers is taken by the successful merchant or manufacturer or railroad builder.—Youth's Companion.

Expensive Good Fortune.

The following story of a "great find"—a five-dollar bill—and its greater consequences is reprinted from the New York World. It bears very plainly the marks of exaggeration, but there must be many of our readers who will know by their own experience that it is based on one of the facts of human nature.

Paxton found a five-dollar bill on the sidewalk the other day, and if he should find another it would probably bring him to the poorhouse.

"Hooray!" he said, as he jammed the bill into his vest pocket. "Now I'll get that derby hat I've wanted so long. I saw one yesterday that this bill will just pay for."

The bill did pay for the hat, but not for the two-dollar pair of gloves that went with it.

When he went home to dinner he laid a two-pound box of Huyler's best candy on his wife's lap, and said, with a kiss such as he had not given her since the days of their honeymoon:

"Guess what I found to-day?"

"I couldn't, my dear."

"No, I don't suppose you could. Well, I found a five-dollar bill, and I thought I could afford to be a little extravagant on the strength of it. I paid two dollars for that candy, box included. Then I got two of the best seats for the theater to-night, and couldn't we afford a little supper afterward? Bought me an elegant new white silk necktie and the cutest and neatest little pearl pin, and if you want a new pair of evening gloves you may have them. It isn't every day I find a five-dollar bill."

"No, thank heaven, it isn't," said his wife to herself, and she said still more fervently when he added:

"I bought the loveliest bit of bric-a-brac at an auction sale I happened to run into. It was a big bargain at five dollars. I'd had to pay at least eight dollars for it at a regular sale. I found that five dollars just in time."

"How did you happen to buy that little sewing-chair you sent home to-day?"

"Oh, that? Well, I heard you say the other day that you wanted one when we could afford it, and when I saw that in a window to-day with a card on it saying that it was only five dollars, I thought if we couldn't afford it when I'd just found five dollars we never could afford it, so I ran in and bought it."

And when he had bought ninety-three dollars and sixty-four cents' worth of things with that five dollars, his anxious wife brought him to a halt by saying one evening:

"Where did you find that five-dollar bill, George?"

"On K street."

"Well, here's an advertisement in the evening paper stating that a poor widow lost five dollars on K street Tuesday morning. I haven't a doubt that the bill you found was hers, and the poor woman must have it back again."

And she got it, to Paxton's disgust.

Don't Start Rumors.

Damaging truths are bad enough.

Damaging untruths—or truths perniciously exaggerated or purposely colored—are worse still. In these times, when business confidence is none too firmly established, it ill becomes any man to endanger by word or insinuation the confidence that may exist between creditor and debtor. Many a bank has gone down in consequence of a run excited by false alarm; and the shores of commercial history are strewn with the wrecks of countless firms whose downfall was brought about by the sudden commercial demands of suspicious creditors.

Business is built on credit.

Credit is built on confidence.

There is no surer way of undermining a man's business than by giving credence to and circulating rumors about him. The man who stealthily applies the torch to a building is no more despicable than he who applies the firebrands of distrust to the reputation of a business establishment. It is with this thought that we say that those men who indiscriminately disseminate incorroborated rumors are guilty of an act for which there should be a fitting punishment.

Seeing by Night.

Nocturnal creatures assume night activity for some other reason than that they cannot see by day or that they see better by night. The bat sees admirably in the brightest sunlight, as any one knows who has ever teased one by poking a stick at it. It will open its mouth and make an angry grab at the stick, when it is several inches distant from it. Prof. Bolles says it is the same with the owl. They see perfectly in bright sunlight, and better at night than most creatures.

Treatment.—Just as the treatment of the physician must be regulated by the character of the patient, so must different methods of treatment be used in attempts at fostering the religious development.—Dr. D. S. Jordan, Unitarian, Oakland, Cal.

Purpose In Life.—We must have a distinct purpose in living and we cannot put that purpose too high. A man only becomes what he makes himself, and we rarely reach the goal without exerting every energy.—Bishop Whitaker, Episcopalian, Philadelphia, Pa.

Punishment.—God has said that as surely as we die in a state of sin we shall be condemned to eternal punishment. This alone is enough to make one shudder, and, therefore, many reject the words, allowing fear to blind their reason.—Rev. M. Otis, Catholic, San Francisco, Cal.

Duty.—The climax of a human career is reached not necessarily when what the world calls success comes, but when, in the presence of probable defeat and surrender, the resolve is made to walk alone, if need be, and do one's duty.—Rev. F. A. Linkeley, Lutheran, Philadelphia, Pa.

War.—War is terrible from any standpoint, and when carried on for the personal gratification of pride or avarice in the whole catalogue of human crimes there is none blacker. But there are times when war is grand and when God's sanction rests upon it.—Rev. S. G. Welskotten, Lutheran, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Duty of Life.—To do good to others, to relieve suffering, to nurse the sick, to save young lives by education, and all similar efforts carry their rewards with them, and may be practiced for the pure enjoyment which they afford; then they are defensible on rational grounds.—Rev. G. Gotheil, Hebrew, New York City.

The Book of Books.—I lean upon the old book, and I challenge those who doubt its words to show me where its words are wrong. The word is right, interpret it as you may. It is God's word, unchangeable, unalterable. It is his work, and shall stand from everlasting until everlasting.—Rev. William Ramsay, Methodist, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sense.—Our bodily senses are the axles on which character turns to and fro. A man with no senses is a man without sense, actual or possible. Each man will be judged by what his eye saw or refused to see; by what his ear heard or refused to hear; by that his sense did or refused to do.—Rev. G. D. Boardman, Baptist, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Old and the New.—There has always been change and evolution in religion and religious circles. Nothing can remain stationary. The old wine skins must allow the new to have a place in the preservation and distribution of the wine of life. All that is true in the old endures. Truth cannot die. Falsehood, whether old or new, cannot lie too soon.—Rev. H. T. Shepard, Congregationalist, San Francisco, Cal.

God's Giving.—God is the source of good. His nature is to give. Outpouring, bestowing, making better and more blessed—that is the way love, his being, expresses itself. And he is the only source of good. Every gift that is worth having, every true joy, every uplifting influence, every helpful possession is ours, not through our earning, but from his giving.—Rev. C. A. Millar, Lutheran, New York City.

CHANGING PLATES IN DAYLIGHT.

Bag in Which the Amateur Photographer Can Work.

A splendid new accessory for amateur photographers is a bag for changing plates in broad daylight, which allows the operator to see what he is doing. The dry plates and plate holders are first placed within the bag, the eyepiece is then adjusted around the face, and by unfastening a button part of the black material composing the bag is lapped over, revealing a double layer of red translucent material, which admits light enough to see by, but keeps out the white rays absolutely. Since this bag can be folded into a very small space it is a great convenience to carry along, particularly when traveling.

Wise in His Generation.

A certain Paris photographer never says to a certain lady customer: "Now, look pleasant, madam, if you please." He knows a formula infinitely better than that. In the most natural manner in the world he remarks: "It is unnecessary to ask madam to look pleasant; she could not look otherwise." Then click goes the camera, and the result is never in doubt.—London Morning.

An Absurd Project.

"Colonel, we are intending to erect an artistic drinking place in the center of the park, and thought perhaps you might subscribe a small——"

"The project is sheer nonsense, sir. Do you imagine fo' an instant that the city will grant a license?"—Indianapolis Journal.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

COWS IN THE MEADOW.

When springing meads are freshly dight,
And trees new leaved throw scarce a shadow,
The green earth shows no fairer sight
Than soft-eyed kine and blowing meadow,
Too calm for care, too slow for mirth,
Amid the shower, amid the gleam,
The great mild mother creatures seem
Half-waking forms of the dreary earth.

And down the pathway through the grass
To school the merry children pass,
Singing a rhyme in the April morns,
How—There's red for the furrows, and white for the daisies,
Brown eyes for the brooks, for the trees crumpled horns!

When quivering leaves make leaves of light
And both the sward beneath them dapple,
When May boughs cream in curling white,
And strawberry cream doth flush the apple,
The great mild mother creatures lie
And grow, in absence of the sun,
One with the moon and stars, and one
With silvery cloud and hushed dark sky.

And down the pathway through the grass,
To school the merry children pass,
Singing a rhyme in the morns of June
How—There's white for the cloudlets and black for the darkness,
And two polished horns for the sweet sickle moon.

SETTLED OUT OF COURT.

"The most remarkable civil action I ever heard of," said a well-known attorney to a group of friends at the Lawyers' Club, "was a case tried in one of the circuit courts of New Jersey some fifteen years ago. As I happened to be one of the counsel in the case, I remember the facts, and I have never seen any record of a similar lawsuit.

"This case was tried before the late Judge Gaines, and was entitled, Stacy vs. Parton, and Parton vs. Stacy, for there were counter actions growing out of the same state of facts. George Stacy lived in a small town on the Upper Delaware River, and owned a truck farm some three miles up the valley from his home. His farm lay along the bank of the river, and he shipped vegetables in season to New York and Philadelphia, besides supplying the local market. He had a good trade in the village, and kept a small flat-bottomed boat, which he used to transport his stuff from the farm.

"Stacy would load the boat with vegetables at the farm in the early morning, and float down stream to the town. When he had sold out it was a matter of an hour's hard work to row or pole the boat back, but it was cheaper than keeping a team. The man lived in a small house near the river on the south side of town. He was a widower about 50 years old, and had a family of several children, all of them grown up.

"Across the street from Stacy lived Mrs. Caroline Parton, a widow, who was a few years younger than the farmer. She, too, had several children, all about grown. Mrs. Parton owned a small tract of land just above her cottage, where she pastured a number of cows. She sold milk and butter in the town, and, with keeping a few boarders and taking in sewing, managed to earn a comfortable living.

"One morning Stacy came to town with a load of fresh cabbage on his boat. He drew his frail craft up to the bank at the usual landing place, and secured it there by tying a rope around a stake in the ground. The other end of the rope was fastened to one of the oar locks on the boat. Leaving boat and cargo unguarded, he went up to the town market to sell his stock.

"It happened on that particular morning that one of Mrs. Parton's most valuable milk cows had jumped over the pasture fence and was browsing along the banks of the river. The smell of fresh cabbage reached the nostrils of the cow, and as Stacy's boat lay full length along the bank it was an easy matter for her to step aboard, where a good breakfast lay unguarded.

"Some of the neighbors saw the widow's cow eating the farmer's cabbage, but for some reason, never explained why they did not inform either of the parties at interest. It may seem strange that a cow should turn from a crate of fresh cabbage to chew a cotton rope, but that was what really happened. The result was that her sharp teeth soon cut the rope in two, and then the boat, freed from its moorings, began to float down stream.

"Stacy, coming back from the market, was startled to see his boat drifting down the river with a cow standing in the bow lashing her tail in fear and bellowing aloud for aid. Mrs. Parton heard the voice of the favorite of her herd and reached the bank of the river at the same time as the farmer.

"The current was strong and swift at that point and there was not another boat in sight. Half a mile below the town some big jagged rocks rose out of the water near the middle of the river. Stacy's boat was caught in a swift eddy, and while the owner looked on helpless to do anything the frail craft struck broadside on a sharp rock. It recoiled from the blow, turned partly around and sank in mid-stream.

"Mrs. Parton's cow evidently could not swim, or else the current was too strong for her. She went down with the boat and did not come to the surface again.

"The farmer swore softly when he saw his boat go down and the widow threw an apron over her head to shut out a sight of the death struggles of her favorite cow. Then the two neighbors watched the river for a few moments in silence.

"When they turned away Mrs. Parton was the first to speak.

"'My cow was worth every cent of $40 Mr. Stacy. You know how poor I am. I shall need the money as soon as you can spare it."

"'Why, Mrs. Parton, you surely do not expect me to pay you for the cow?' said Stacy.

"'Certainly, I do. The boat belonged to you.'

"'Exactly, and who is to pay for that and the load of cabbage? Your cow chewed the rope in two.'

"'But you left the boat unguarded.'

"'Your cow jumped out of the pasture.'

"'You should have fastened the boat with a chain.'

"'You ought to keep your cows where they belong.'

"'It was your boat that carried her off. Maybe there is some law to protect a poor lone widow who has to work for a living. I didn't think you would treat me so.'

"'My boat is worth three times as much as your cow.'

"'That's right! Impose on me all you can because I am a woman with no one to protect me.'

"By this time Mrs. Parton was in tears and the neighbors separated. Stacy called on the widow next day and told her that he had proof that her cow bit the rope in two and set the boat adrift.

"She retorted that she could prove in a court of law that the boat was not securely anchored and defied him to bring suit.

"All attempts at compromise failed, and the upshot of it all was that Mrs. Parton brought suit against Stacy to recover the sum of $40, the value of one cow.

"The farmer retained the firm of which I was a member, and brought a counter-suit to recover the value of one wooden flatboat and one load of cabbage. The town was about equally divided in its opinion of the legal merits of the case, but the burden of sympathy was with the widow. Before the papers in Stacy's case were filed the double action was the talk of the town, and it was predicted that we would have to get a change of venue in order to obtain an impartial jury.

"Three months after the suits were brought the case came to trial in the Circuit Court. Mrs. Parton's suit was tried first, by agreement. A score of witnesses were examined, and the Judge took a lively interest in the trial from the outset. The court room was crowded with spectators.

"The examination of Stacy by Judge Gaines was something like this:

"'You are George Stacy, the defendant?'

"'I am.'

"'This is a very remarkable case, Mr. Stacy.'

"'Yes.'

"'You are a neighbor of this plaintiff?'

"'Yes.'

"'Known her long?'

"'Forty years, about.'

"'From childhood?'

"'Yes.'

"'You are a widower, I believe, Mr Stacy?'

"'I am.'

"'Mrs. Parton is a widow?'

"'Yes.'

"'You both have children grown up?'

"'Yes.'

"'In the ordinary course of events you will both be alone in the world very soon. Your children will marry and leave you.'

"'I suppose so.'

"'You have known Mrs. Parton forty years?'

"'About that long.'

"The Judge was silent for several minutes, during which time he slowly turned the leaves of a law book that lay open on his desk. The jurors were leaning forward in their seats, looking first at the plaintiff and then at the defendant. Stacy was getting nervous, and began to turn and twist in the witness chair. By this time the plaintiff had evidently caught the drift of the Judge's questions. She kept her eyes fixed on the floor, but I could see her color coming and going rapidly.

"The Judge cleared his throat and turned to the witness again. There was just the trace of a smile on his face as he said to Stacy: 'This is a very peculiar case.'

"'She brought suit first,' the witness stammered.

"'You own a farm, Mr. Stacy?'

"'I do.'

"'Mrs. Parton owns some cows?'

"'I believe so.'

"'How many cows do you own?'

"'None!'

"The Judge looked at his law book again and then glanced at the plaintiff for a moment.

"'Have you tried to settle this case out of court, Mr. Stacy?

"'Yes, before she brought suit.'

"'Did you offer to compromise?'

"'No.'

"'Mrs. Parton is a good woman?'

"'She is.'

"'She is a smart woman?'

"'I never saw a better worker.'

"'Was she a good wife and mother?'

"'Yes.'

"'Don't you think the case can be settled out of court?'

"'That's for Mrs. Parton to say.'

"'Are you willing to try to settle it?'

"By this time every person in the court room was smiling broadly. Stacy's face was as red as a beet, and Mrs. Parton was blushing furiously.

"Judge Grimes, with a smile of satisfaction, announced that a recess would be taken in order that the defendant might have a private conference with the plaintiff.

"Half an hour later Stacy and Mrs. Parton came into the court room hand in hand, and, going up to the Judge, they announced that they had agreed to settle their case out of court. They were married by the Judge, and that ended the case of Parton vs. Stacy. The suit of Stacy vs. Parton was withdrawn."

The fiery furnace is always a good place to the man who gets into it by following Christ.

Love among spirits is what gravitation is to matter. It binds the universe to a common center—God.

The main reason why some people get so little good by going to prayer meeting is because they expect so little.

Unanswerable.

A man doesn't like to see his pet theories and favorite dogmas attacked and everturned in a manner that leaves him no opportunity for successful reply. Yet many men—we see them every day, and read their vain and vapid tirades—will argue and dispute and vociferously declaim long after they know they are beaten—annihilated. One of the best answers in view of this kind of a defeat was that once made by James I. of England.

James had been reading a work entitled "Description of the Policy of the Church of England," written by the historian Calderwood, which severely handled a few of his pet theories. James fancied himself a profound theologian. The King read until he became angry, and then he threw the book down, with a bitter anathema upon it.

A prelate of the church who chanced to be standing near inquired of his Majesty the cause of his trouble.

The King named the work, and answered that he had been reading it.

"O!" said the prelate, with unhesitating confidence, "do not let the work give your Majesty one moment's uneasiness. We will answer it."

"Answer it!" repeated James, in a passion. "And what will you answer, man? There is nothing in it but Scripture, honestly quoted, and sound reason. It is unanswerable—and that's what troubles me."

Responsibility in Talking.

The absolute lack of responsibility which a good many well-meaning people show in the matter of talking would be incredible if one were constantly coming upon illustrations of its extent. Men and women give forth impressions and repeat, without qualification or condemnation, statements regarding others which have absolutely no foundation in fact, and to ascertain the truth or falsity of which not the slightest effort has been made. The same people would shrink from the idea of burning down a man's house or taking a ten-dollar bill out of his pocket, but they do not hesitate to smirch his character or destroy his peace of mind; calamities much more difficult to bear than the results of arson or theft. Society stands in great need of sound education regarding personal responsibility for talk which affects the character or standing of others.—Christian Union.

FARM AND GARDEN

A Valuable New Radish.

The lists of good, early radishes are so large that all but experts may find it difficult to make a suitable selection. French Breakfast, Early Scarlet Turnip, Scarlet Olive-Shaped and others have long been general favorites, but the new Henderson's Rose Turnip radish—a life-like illustration of which is shown herewith—is second to none in beauty as well as quality and earliness. It has a small, compact top and a miniature root, requires only twenty-three days to mature and remains in good condition for ten days. Its beautiful rosy pink color renders it very attractive when bunched.—American Agriculturist.

Quickly Made Hedge.

American Gardening shows a short cut to a handsome hedge. A "form" is made of wire netting, the sides and top also being covered. Along the base on either side of this quickly growing vines are planted, which soon cover the wire with a mass of green that becomes more and more dense and beautiful each succeeding year if the proper sort of vines are used. The "proper sort" would include our common woodbine. It is a quick grower, and its foliage is remarkably handsome, both in the green state and when touched by autumn frosts. There are many other vines, however, that would answer admirably for this purpose, so that all tastes can be suited. Such a hedge needs only such annual clipping as will suffice to keep the vines growing evenly all over the wire—as thickly in one place as in another.

TO MAKE A HEDGE QUICKLY.

Keep the Sheep at Home.

The illustration, from Farm and Home, portrays a sheep poke made of a hickory stick (a) 4 or 5 feet long, bent in the center, and a wire (b) fastened about 10 inches below the bend and another (c) after the poke is slipped over the sheep's neck, 4 or 5 inches lower down to fasten the poke in place. This device will keep any sheep from going through a wire, rail or board fence, is a good thing for jumping sheep, and will prevent them from crowding into bushes and briers, tearing the wool from the body. Grazing or drinking is not interfered with.

SHEEP POKE.

This Country's Big Hog Industry.

The hog industry in the United States has reached tremendous proportions. No less than 16,928,978 swine were slaughtered by the packers of the West alone last year. The whole number the country over would amount to half as much more, or about 25,000,000 altogether. It was the greatest hog year in our history except 1890-1, when the pork packing business reached high-water mark. In the region northwest of the Ohio river last year farmers and live stock men received for the hogs they raised $135,456,000.

Good Roads.

Good country roads are an index of the thrift and prosperity of a community. Smooth and well-kept roadsides are a necessary adjunct to a well-cultivated farm. This means that there must be no weedy fence corners nor fences overgrown with briars, thistles and vines. The lanes may be made to yield a large amount of hay, if the surface of the ground be properly leveled and cultivated, and the appearance be so much improved, that many dollars per acre would be added to the value of the adjoining farms. We wish our readers would try it, see the results as we have seen them.

A Race of Apple Eaters.

Does any one know of any good reason why we should not be a race of apple eaters? By this we refer to the habit or practice of eating apples raw. The Bulletin of Pharmacy advances what we believe to be a valuable suggestion along this line of action. It says: "No harm can come even to a delicate system by eating of ripe and juicy apples just before going to bed." It also remarks that the apple is rich is phosphoric acid. What is not so well known, however, observes the Nebraska Farmer, it points out, is that it thoroughly disinfects the mouth, excites action of the liver, promotes a sound and healthful sleep, helps the kidney secretions and prevents calculus growths, obviates indigestion, and is one of the best-known preventives of diseases of the throat. These are benefits enough to make us all apple eaters, surely.

Separate the Flocks.

The first thing to do with flocks that are kept on farms rather than on ranches is to separate the flock into a number of small ones, each composed of one kind, and having a regard to sex, age and general condition. The weak ones should not be placed with the strong. The wether or stock flock should be in one flock, the breeding ewes in another, and the lambs in another, if the best results are to be secured.

Save the Young Timber.

There is always a demand for good timber, especially of the quick-growing kinds, such as pine, oak and birch. A piece of land cleared will in thirty-five or forty years have a new growth large enough for box boards, and spoolstrips, and there should be more attention given to this source of income. Stronger and more systematic laws protecting timber should be passed.

Turkey Food.

The best feed for young turkeys is a cake made of equal parts of ground oats, corn and wheat baked so that it will crumble. They ought to have their freedom from yards as soon as possible, say when two weeks old, but should be housed at night. Nothing is better than good, whole corn to fatten turkeys.

Good for Hogs.

To keep hogs thrifty when fattening mix two quarts of wood ashes or fine charcoal with one pint salt and a quarter of a pound of sulphur. Ten hogs will eat this mixture once a week.—Agriculturist.

Poultry Points.

Dry earth is a good material to scatter under the roosts.

On the average it will cost $1 to keep a laying hen one year.

When a thrifty bird is fully matured, it is easily fattened.

Stale bread soaked in milk is a good feed for young poultry.

Early hatched, well developed pullets make good winter layers.

Cleanliness and good feeding are the secrets of success with poultry.

Leghorns and Black Spanish lay eggs with the whitest shells of any breed.

A cross of the Wyandottes and Langshans combines many good qualities that make a fowl valuable for market.

Oilmeal, sunflower seed, hemp seed and buckwheat can all be used to good advantage in feeding fowls intended for exhibition.

Slaughter of Birds.

One of the largest importers of feathers in England, Mr. Weller, is reported to have made this statement: "Until recently, millions of birds of paradise, sunbirds, humming birds, etc., were slaughtered annually; in one forest in France alone one-half a million little songsters were caught every year; while, had it not been for State interference, the nightingales of Germany would now have been practically extinct. In all, the importation of feathers lately amounted to considerably more than £1,000,000 per annum." Many tons of feathers still annually change hands. "But our business," said Mr. Weller, "with the exception of one line, has declined rapidly." And the reason of the decline, we are informed, is "the activity displayed by a ladies' society established for the purpose of boycotting hats, etc., for which small feathers are used for adornment." It is added that the society, which was started only a year or two ago, has reduced the feather business to half its dimensions. Of course, all considerate women will be pleased to hear this; for now such species of birds as have not already been exterminated will have a chance of surviving and reviving.

Chinese Similes.

Some of the ordinary expressions of the Chinese are pointedly sarcastic enough. A blustering, harmless fellow they call "a paper tiger." When a man values himself overmuch, they compare him to "a rat falling into a scale, and weighing itself." Overdoing a thing they call "a hunchback making a bow." A spendthrift they compare to "a rocket" which goes off at once. Those who expend their charity on remote objects, but neglect their family, are said to "hang a lantern on a pole, which is seen afar, but gives no light below."

Every steamer that sails along the coast is a refuge for birds that are blown to sea, mostly small and not strong of wing. When disturbed or frightened by people on deck, they fly into the air and fall behind the ship. After several disturbances they become so tired that they can no longer catch up, and after hopelessly chasing the vessel for several miles flutter into the sea and are drowned.

WOMAN'S REALM

NEW WOMAN EVEN IN CHINA.

AMONG delegates to the women's congress to be held in London next year will be two Chinese girls, Miss Wang and Dr. Hu King Eng. The latter is a leader in the small but pertinacious army of Chinese women who have risen in revolt against the subjection of their sex in the Orient. Dr. Hu was born in Foochow to a heritage of wealth and aristocracy. Her grandfather, Hu, was a mandarin of influence. In the seventieth year of his age he became a convert to Christianity, and with him his two sons, Hu Po Mi and Hu Yong Mi—King Eng's father—both of whom for more than thirty years have been Methodist pastors and presiding elders. Soon Grandmother Hu and her daughters-in-law, all of the bound foot class, influenced by convincing, even coercive, arguments, also reluctantly embraced the alien faith. When quite a child King Eng was placed in the girl's boarding school at Foochow. Furtive peeps into the dispensary and wards of the adjacent hospital, however, determined effectually her vocation to be medicine. With that end in view the little high caste celestial maid, now in her fifteenth year, came across the seas, having met and conquered bitter, determined opposition. She immediately entered the Ohio Wesleyan University, graduating four years later a master of arts. Three years more of study and the degree of doctor of medicine was conferred by the Woman's Medical College of Philadelphia, and also, after a brief postgraduate course, by the Philadelphia Polyclinic. Then followed several months of practical work in the Woman's hospital of Boston. In December of 1895 Dr. Hu, fully equipped for her life work, returned to Foochow to assume charge of Liang-au Hospital. A triumphant home-coming it was. Mandarins and coolies, high and low, met the ship, eager to pay their respects.

Miss Dill's Long Trip.

One of the longest equestrian recreation trips on record has been begun by

MISS EMMA DILL.

Miss Emma Dill, of Orange, N. J., who is accompanied by her father and three other men. Mr. Dill, a wealthy lawyer, arranged the trip with Walter D. Grand, managing director of Tattersall's, London. The journey is to be from Orange to the Rangeley lakes, Maine, via Poughkeepsie, the Berkshire hills, Vermont, Canada, the White mountains and northern Maine. Each member of the party will ride an Indian pony, fourteen of these hardy little animals having been provided. Miss Dill is the most enthusiastic member of the cavalcade, her only regret being that she cannot ride her favorite saddle horse. She is a familiar figure on horseback in the neighborhood of Orange, taking equestrian exercise in all sorts of weather.

Girls Expect Too Much of Young Men

"The average young man is the agreeable fellow who earns enough money to take care of himself and to put by a little for special occasions," writes Ruth Ashmore in the Ladies' Home Journal. "But he is not a millionaire, and he is not the young man drawn by those illustrators who, in black and white, give us so-called society sketches. A combination of foolish influences makes the girl of to-day expect entirely too much from the young man of to-day. She read, or is told, that when a young man is engaged to be married he sends his fiancee so many pounds of sweets, so many boxes of flowers, as well as all the new books and all the new music that may appear each week. * * * If there were more honest girls in this world—honest in their treatment of young men—there would be a greater number of marriages and fewer thieves. Yes, I mean exactly what I say. It is the expectation on the part of a foolish girl that a man should do more than he can honestly, that has driven many men to the pentitentiary, and many more to lives of so-called single blessedness."

Women in Business.

"All women who are active in business or professions want is a fair field and no favor," says Margaret Sangster. "We ask for nothing on the ground of sex. We are willing to compete with and work with men on their own ground and desire to be measured by the same standards. We demand no courtesy further than that which prevails between gentlemen; we expect no deference. In business life men and women are simply workers, and the more the element of sex is intruded the greater the interference with the success of women. The business woman who expects little attentions she is accustomed to in the drawing-room shows her ignorance of business. If they are necessary to her peace of mind she is out of place in the business world."

Woman Will Practice Law.

Mrs. Henrietta Wilkie, of Anderson, Ind., was recently admitted to the bar. Her admittance was protested by Attorney John Beeler, of that city, but Mrs. Wilkie by her eloquence, won the judge's opinion. Her husband is a well-known lawyer of Anderson, and they will practice together.

Hints to Home Dressmakers.

In ninety cases out of 100 a dress made at home is undeniably second rate, or worse, in that mysterious quality called "style." Why it is that professional dressmakers, who are presumably women of little education and no particular talent, can produce satisfactory gowns with a pronounced chic in cut and style that proclaims them at once to be "custom made," while the amateur, with greater taste and cultivated artistic intelligence and perception, should make such abortive creations whenever she tries to make her own dresses is a problem that is often commented upon. "Home-made" gowns are certainly not as smart as those "built" by professionals, but why not? Why cannot women of intelligence who have straitened incomes dress themselves and their daughters without calling in extraneous aid? It seems such a simple thing to do, especially in these days when the most reliable patterns of the latest fashions may be had almost for the asking, and materials cost next to nothing.

In the first place, the trade-mark, as it were, is wanting in amateur work. A dressmaker does everything by rule and rote, but this want of technical knowledge could be easily rectified either by taking the trouble to learn the trade, which is taught in comparatively few lessons, or by copying in detail the construction of a gown from a good dressmaker's. "Finish" is also one of the great essentials in which professionals score to advantage. Take the wrist of an amateur's sleeve, for instance, and that of a professional of good reputation. The difference is most marked. The bottom of the skirt too almost invariably betrays its origin, besides many other little details dependent upon the character of the dress. Finally, another marked difference between amateur and first-class professional work is in the generous use of material. The former never "skimps," whereas the latter, if she makes her own gowns, obviously tries to save every penny. In home-made millinery especially this skimpiness is very apparent. A young woman with a pretty taste in trimming bonnets who could easily have half a dozen hats for the price she confesses naively that she is obliged to buy her headgear and give large sum for each confection, because she simply cannot make up her mind to buy as much ribbon or as many flowers as is really required.

"Dear me!" exclaimed the two-headed girl, as the armless wonder suddenly gathered her to his bosom. "You always semed so shy." "Only in the presence of strangers," replied the youth, kissing her tenderly upon each of her marble brows. And yet in the drama there is much that is truly and genuinely sincere.—Detroit Tribune.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, EDITOR, ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 27.....1897

Great effort is being made on the part of the writers of the gold bug press and those in the employ of the trust syndicates to educate the country into the false belief that the silver question is dead; that the issue of 16 to 1 is a thing of the past: and that bimetallism will not again come before the public as a political question. That the gold gamblers have succeeded in bearing the silver market is true; that they have been the means of closing down valuable mines is a fact; that they have thrown thousands of men out of employment and financially ruined whole sections of the country, must be admitted. However, if silver were to-day accorded the rights and privileges freely granted to gold, it would sell in the markets at the ratio of 16 to 1, and the country would enjoy the prosperity of which it was robbed by a worse than criminal legislation. Hundreds of thousands of men were induced to vote for McKinley under false statements regarding the ruin that would follow the success of free silver, and under false promises of the prosperity that would dawn upon the country the moment the count of the ballots indicated the election of a man for President who had been a life-long silver advocate, but who traded his principles for a nomination at St. Louis. That the silver question is the paramount issue before the people, and that they are ready to resent the fact that they were misled in the last campaign, have been borne out by the elections held throughout the United States since the first of the year. The Silver men made a clean sweep at the Chicago election, and at heavy municipal elections in the country since. Last week in the Fourth Congressional District in Indiana a Silver Democrat was elected to succeed the late Judge Holman by an increased majority of over 1500. In the State of New York the Democratic Committee in every county has endorsed the Silver plank of the Chicago platform, and the Republican Silver men are having constant accessions to their ranks. A union of forces in 1900 will elect a President on a Silver platform.

The expressed determination of the immigration officials to prevent the landing of European anarchists upon our shores will receive the cordial approval of all patriots and right-thinking Americans. For entertainment of anarchistic faith it may be one cannot be excluded under the present restrictive laws. But if the intending immigrant is expelled from another country for acts that would here be criminal he may be forbidden to land. Every European anarchist is a criminal plotter, if not an actor in crime. He is, therefore, one of the class likely to become dependent here, criminal charges upon this country, and all such should, therefore, be excluded. Every day it is becoming more and more the conviction of the American people that the bars should be put up higher, and the restrictive laws made more rigid and discriminating.

Here is what Senator Stewart said when asked with reference to recent reports if he had stopped talking silver: "Me stop talking silver?" said the Senator, "That would be to stop advocating that which will insure permanent prosperity. Now is the time to talk silver. In prosperity is our greatest hope of winning. Better times bring independence. Success removes the shackles from downtrodden men. Last year men were the slaves of the plutocrats. Hunger drove them to sell their votes or to submit to dictation. Prosperity will make them independent, and they will vote according to their judgment, and that will be for silver."

The pocket of gold discovered in Trinity County will probably result in a rush of prospectors to that section. Not one in ten or in fifty will be likely to stumble upon a rich pocket find. But at least there can be no great suffering for the disappointed; no icy passes to cross; no weeks of weary tramping at high altitudes in wind and snow; no rafting down lakes and rivers with the thermometer threatening the freezing point; no risks of sea or perils of a wild and desolate land. No, even failure on Trinity is preferable to the attempt to storm the Klondike section in Arctic winter.

The expected aftermath of the crazed rush for the Klondike gold fields has already begun to appear. Reports from the north tell us of scores of poor fellows who are left perched on the rocks around the inlets in the vicinity of Dyea, stranded, helpless and hopeless. They have no money to pay the exorbitant transportation charges, their baggage and provisions are water soaked or lost, and they are already feeling the pangs of hunger and the nipping of the frost. It is said that some of them have sold their belongings for almost nothing and are on their way back.

"Sassiety" at Los Angeles is discussing whether Mrs. Bradbury should be recognized when she returns to the city, now that she and her husband are reconciled after her late disgraceful escapade. If Mrs. Bradbury were not the wife of a millionaire, the question would not be under discussion at all. It would be settled against her without any discussion. The glitter of the gold makes the difference.

Why not try Durrant for the murder of Minnie Williams? He might be convicted and hanged for that murder long before the law points in the Blanche Lamont case will be settled.

DEATH OF JUDGE GILL.

Last Monday a telegram was received at Independence announcing the death of Geo. M. Gill, at Riverside.

George Monroe Cill was born at Stockton, California, March 18, 1859, and came to Inyo County with his parents in September, 1894, participating in the hardships and privations of the early Inyo pioneer life. At an early age he began the study of the law and was admitted to practice in 1875. In 1880 he removed to Mammoth, and later to Bodie, where he served a term as Deputy District Attorney of Mono County, but soon returned to this county and practiced law at Bishop until 1885, when he returned to Stockton, Cal., and there engaged in the practice of law in partnership at different times with P. W. Bennett, Esq., Senator Baldwin and J. C. Campbell, Esq. In 1886 commenced the early symptoms of rheumatism, which ultimately resulted in his death. In 1887 he returned to Inyo County in the hope of regaining his failing health. In 1888 he was elected District Attorney of this county and served a term of two years as such. In 1890 he was elected Superior Judge of Inyo County and served a term of six years in that capacity.

The gradual encroach of the fatal disease made him an invalid for the past six years and in the hope of being bettered by a change to a warmer climate he removed to Riverside, Cal., at which place he died on the 22d inst. His death at this time was unexpected, as letters received here dated the day before his death are written in his usual good-natured strain and expressed the opinion that he was improving. For the last few years he was utterly helpless, being unable to move without assistance, yet his mind never lost its brightness; he never complained, and maintained a bright and cheerful demeanor to the end. Through all he was nursed and cared for with the most untiring patience by his most devoted wife, who, with two daughters, constitute his family. His mother and many other relatives live in this county, and together with a host of friends mourn his taking away. He was a member of Inyo Lodge, No. 221, F. & A. M. Judge Lamar appointed a committee of the Bar to draft resolutions to his memory, which will be published next week.

R. K. Colcord and J. A. Yerington were in Bishop Monday night on business relating to the proposed deal for the Smith & Best mines. The purchasers are J. A. Yerington, R. K. Colcord, J. F. Parr and Geo. T. Mills, who have bought (not bonded) the property in question, comprising the Molus mine and its east and west extensions, all in Piute Canyon, about 18 miles north of Bishop. Active work to develop the property on an extensive scale will begin at once, and men have already been put to work to improve the road. The Molus shaft is now down nearly 100 feet, and will be sunk as much deeper as the first move. A mill will shortly be erected. While electricity may be the power used, it is more probable that water power and a tramway will be used. Governor Colcord will for the present personally superintend the operations. All reports agree in pronouncing the group of mines a valuable one, and our people hope the purchasers will find a bonanza.—Register.

In a letter for the public, ex-Governor Grant, of the Omaha Grant smelter, says, regarding the continued fall in the price of silver: "In my opinion the world can produce not to exceed 150,000,000 ounces per annum at 50 cents per ounce. The annual absorption is greater than 150,000,000 ounces, so that 50 cents should be a bed-rock price. In the immediate future it may go below 50 cents, because smelters and others are offering to sell millions at the best prices to be obtained, thirty, sixty and ninety days hence. This is done with a view to getting rid of present stocks with as little loss as possible. I put 50 cents as bed-rock, because I believe that the world will continue to absorb an increasing amount of silver from year to year, and I don't believe that it is possible to maintain the present output at 50 cents."

The formal opening of the Valley road to Visalia will be celebrated in Tulare County's capital in conjunction with the festival of Admission Day. Sixty-five miles of track remains to be laid to fill up the gap between Hanford and the Kern County seat, and twenty-five miles of that stretch have already been graded. It is confidently believed that the line will be in operation between Stockton and Bakersfield before the dawn of another year.

A young man purchased 2,000 fine cigars and then insured them for their full value, smoked them up, and then demanded the insurance, claiming that they had been destroyed by fire. The case was taken to the court and decided in favor of the young man. The insurance company then had him arrested for setting fire to his own property, and the same Judge ordered that he pay a fine and go to jail for three months.

The monthly statement issued by the Director of the Mint shows that during the month of July the coinage at the United States mints amounted to $670,850, as follows: Gold, $337,000; silver, $260,000; minor coins, $23,850. No standard silver dollars were coined, as the supply on hand was sufficient for all needs and further that the stock of minor coins has run very low.

If it be true that J. W. Mackey has purchased the Silver Peak mines, and intends to work them on an extensive scale, a lively camp will spring up there.

With the great rise in breadstuff values, increasing the cost of his living, will the laborer's wage be raised? Not much.

It is estimated that the farmers of the United States will receive for their wheat this season about $80,000,000 more than last year. The speculators, who never saw a plow, will reap a harvest of dollars discounting that sum.

The international duel between Henry of Orleans and the Count of Turin will be the cause of at least forty other duels of a similar character. It is barely possible that someone may get slightly hurt.

We do not hear much of the civil disturbance in Brazil, but as the government is negotiating for a loan of $40,000,000 it is evident that the war is flaming up enough to burn money.

Ninety per cent of the flour that finds a market in the far East comes from the United States. The remaining 10 per cent is from India and North China.

A. A. Neil, of Aberdeen, was a visitor in town yesterday.

B. H. Yandell, Esq., went to Bishop yesterday morning.

Constable Murphy made a trip to the Keys mine early in the week.

Henry Bell and Allie McDonald came down from Big Pine last Monday, returning the next day.

C. B. Rawson and Thos. McComas came down from Bishop last Monday on business in the Land Office.

The weather has been cloudy for the past week and showers have fallen in the mountains every afternoon.

Will Hines brought down 13,500 feet of lumber from Big Pine this week with one team of sixteen animals, and small ones at that.

Orrie Johnson, the young man who was hurt at Mazourka, is doing very nicely and will recover. His right hip was dislocated.

Louis Munzinger came down from Bishop on Wednesday and spent a couple of days in town visiting with old time friends.

John Strohmeyer made final proof on his homestead at Georges Creek last Saturday. His witnesses were Chas. Skinner and John Meyer.

Misses Clara and Estella Mayes arrived at Independence from Los Angeles last Thursday and are visiting with their uncle, J. R. Moffett.

A prospecting party last week lost near the Lone Pine bridge two mortars, two pair hobbles, ropes, straps, etc. Will the finder please send word to this office?

J. J. Lonergan, a Los Angeles mining expert, arrived at Independence Wednesday evening, and spent yesterday and to-day examining the Brown Monster mine.

The Chinaman accused of shooting Mrs. Gall at Darwin had a preliminary examination before Justice Davidson last Tuesday and was held over for trial in the Superior Court, his bail being fixed at five hundred dollars.

The case of Lasky et al vs. Carrasco et al, after dragging along its weary length for the past five weeks, was terminated in the Superior Court yesterday. Judge, attorneys, clients and witnesses were alike tired out, and must have heaved a heavy sigh of relief.

Bob. Harry died in the Coso mountains last week. He was in poor health, but started out on a prospecting trip. Some vaqueros who had cattle in that country found him lying dead on his blankets and brought the news into Darwin. A coffin was made and packed out and the unfortunate man buried where he was found.

Judge Virden of the Superior Court of Mono County has decided that the new mining law of California is in conflict with the Federal statutes and hence inoperative. The question came up on the matter of transferring the Bodie District records to the office of the County Recorder, which the Judge thinks need not be done. The miners of Bodie lately elected a Recorder under the old local system.

IN MEMORY OF "PADDY JACK."

The late Judge Gill wrote the following tribute to John Welch, "Paddy Jack," on the 19th inst., and forwarded the verses to this office in a letter written on the 20th, in which he wished to be kindly remembered to his many Inyo friends and stated that his health had inproved very much since removing to Riverside. The telegraph announced the sad news of his death on the 21st:

Another Inyo pioneer—
A sturdy son of toil
Has obeyed the final summons
And "shuffled off the coil."
We did not hear the roll-call,
But the messenger came
And singled out old "Paddy Jack,"
Who answered to his name.

Yes, poor old "Paddy Jack" is gone,
But there's neither word nor sign
To indicate who'll be the next
To step across the line.
Our vision cannot pierce the gloom,
No matter how we yearn;
We only know that each of us
Must answer in his turn.

Full five and twenty years ago,
Which seems a long way back—
When I was but a little boy
I first knew "Paddy Jack."
Don't call me his biographer—
But grant me leave to send
These lines to Paddy's memory
Because he was my friend.

His parents hailed from Ireland—
That little isle so green;
Though Jack—a real Hibernian,
Its shores had never seen.
In truth he had no land of birth,
For Erin—lost to sight—
Out on the broad Atlantic
Is where Jack first saw the light.

I'll not claim for him perfection;
But show me if you can
Where THAT virtue has resided
In any living man.
But this—I'll always claim for Jack,
Though one of lowly birth,
No gentler, kinder, braver man
Has ever trod the earth.

As proof of Paddy's gentleness
And that his heart was warm,
Remember how the little ones
Around him used to swarm?
He labored hard for daily bread—
No wealth at his command,
But Jack was always willing
To extend a helping hand.

That he was brave—who'll doubt it?
For no such word as Fear
Was found in the vocabulary
Of this brawny pioneer.
Of this, I know whereof I speak,
For I have seen him tried;
No braver man than "Paddy Jack"
Has ever lived or died.

Then farewell to you "Paddy Jack"—
You've probed the Great Unknown;
But all of us are "headin'" there
And you are not alone.
When we have crossed the boundary
We hope to greet you then—
But you'll not be HERE to answer
When the roll is called again.

G. M. G.

Riverside, Cal., Aug. 19, 1897.

Col. Hafford and A. G. Bowman closed a deal Thursday in which they sold to Capt. J. B. Black, of Salt Lake, one of their mines in the Slate Range, fifty miles north of here. The consideration was $18,000. Capt. Black is the representative of Utah capitalists, and it is their intention to erect a mill on the property and begin the reduction of ore at once. Col. Hafford and party also bonded an adjoining claim to Geo. Montgomery for one year for $40,000. This leaves them four of the original group of six claims, and the Colonel considers them pretty good property to hold.—Randsburg Miner.

The property mentioned is in Inyo County and among those prospected to some extent thirty-five years ago. This movement and others along the line out there are "straws" indicating that the Salt Lake and Los Angeles railroad proposition is not sleeping.

In the action of Vermilyea & Doyle vs. Judd and Palmer, Judge Virden of the Superior Court appointed Archie Farrington Receiver of the Mammoth mine, in the Mammoth District, in this county. Vermilyea and Doyle are stockholders of the company, which is a Chicago incorporation, and Judd is superintendent of the mine, and Palmer, we believe, is a director. The plaintiffs allege mismanagement, etc., and asked for the appointment of a Receiver. Sheriff Hayes went to Mammoth on Thursday to attend to the matter. The company has fine prospects, and it is to be regretted that there should be any "family troubles" regarding its management. Mr. Farrington, who is now in charge of the property, has had much mining and milling experience and we hope he will bring the property to a productive point.—Bridgeport Chronicle-Union.

Mining Accident.

A young man named Neil McDonald met with a painful accident at the Reward mine yesterday. He had put in and charged a hole which failed to explode. He took out the fuse and removed the cap and found some sawdust in it, and to this he attributed its failure to ignite. He blew in the cap and was in the act of shaking it to remove the sawdust when it exploded, tearing off the first joints of the forefinger and thumb of his left hand and cutting him severely about the face and neck. His right eye is hurt, but the sight is not destroyed. He was brought to town last evening and is being cared for by Dr. Woodin.

A Remarkable Cure of Chronic Diarrhœa.

In 1862, when I served my country as a private in Company A, 167th Pennsylvania Volunteers, I contracted chronic diarrhœa. It has given me a greet deal of trouble ever since. I have tried a dozen different medicines and several prominent doctors without any permanent relief. Not long ago a friend sent me a sample bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy, and after that I bought a bottle and took a 50-cent bottle: and now I can say that I am entirely cured. I cannot be thankful enough to you for this great Remedy, and recommend it to all suffering veterans. If in doubt write me. Yours gratefully, HENRY STEINBERGER, Allentown, Pa. Sold by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

SUPERIOR COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Walter A. Lamar, Judge.

TUESDAY, Aug. 24, 1897.

Estate of Sallie M. Bell, deceased—Sale of real estate to Henry J. Bell confirmed.

Real Estate Transfers.

The following deeds were filed for record during the week ending August 20, 1897:

Baker to Miller—½ interest in 160 acres land near Big Pine—$1600.

Calladine to Cole—½ interest in mining claims in Argus District—$120.

G. C. Kfrby and Emma Kirby to W. H. Thomas—Mining claim in South Park District—$209 36.

Lee Maupin and Lena Reinhakle were married at Big Pine this week and came down to the Reward mine on Wednesday and will make their home there.

Furnishing Country Homes.

There is a curious fancy this year for an immoderate use of an ugly shade of yellow-green in the furnishing of country homes. This very artificial and untrue tint is called "frog green," and is most unharmonious with the greens of nature, and very unbecoming to the human beings who occupy the rooms in which it reigns supreme. It has become such a prevailing fancy that I have heard of persons who have reglazed the lower panes of their window sashes to increase the yellow green light which gives the desired tone to the room. The charm must lie in the novelty of the effect, which always has a fascination with a large majority of womankind.

Nothing can be prettier than certain uses of a true natural green in the right place and in due proportion. A wall in green and white, with a frieze of palmetto leaves, I found very effective in a seaside cottage exposed to the sun. The frieze was two feet deep, and the leaves were as large as a palmetto fan, and had a very airy, cool effect. The picture rod was of bamboo, as well as the mantelpiece and much of the furniture. To these were added a few white chairs, white matting and white goatskin rugs. These bamboo mantelpieces, by the way, are unusual and give the same sort of simple, rural air to a room that the use of wood with its bark upon it gives to a mountain cottage. The mantel may be of pine, stained in a color which matches the bamboo, which can be split and laid on over and under the shelf and fitted to every part of the pine, taking care not to have the joints meet side by side, as putting the canes on irregularly imparts the effect of carving. The entire mantel may be made of whole bamboo and when completed set against the wall, just as you would make "rustic work" from boughs. The beautiful variety of shade and the polished surface of the cane are very decorative.—New York Post.

Everyday Summer Gowns.

Gowns suitable for all purposes will be of cheviot, serge or tweed in plain or mixed colors. The eton jacket, worn with a cotton or silk shirt waist, or merely a false front, is the favorite way of making these gowns. The reefer that buttons or may be reversed is another jacket more suitable for a stout figure, leaving the short bolero for the slender. Mixed goods do not require trimming, and the plain fabrics are lightened with rows, scrolls or hand braiding of hercules or soutache braid. The trimming is arranged according to the material and figure—cross and lengthwise rows on the skirt, in V panels, on the wrists or covering the sleeve to the puff, and on the edge of the jacket only, or completely covering the latter garment.

Small braid covered or large bone buttons are used. Finely twilled serge is preferred. Indistinct plaids are liked in tweeds. Cheviots wear well and are selected for rough traveling suits. I would advise having material intended for hard wear sponged. If one can afford silk for lining the skirt, it will prove light and keep its shape better than anything else. Plaid taffeta waists are very pretty with any of the woolen materials just written of. Select gray, blue, brown or green effects in a figured goods.—Ladies' Home Journal.

The First In the Colony.

Miss Annie J. Duncan has been appointed factory inspector in New South Wales. She will be the first woman factory inspector in that colony. She is well known in London as former sanitary inspector under the Kensington vestry. Miss Duncan is an Australian, the daughter of Dr. Handasyde Duncan, who served for 30 years as immigration and health officer under the government of South Australia. The factories and shop acts which Miss Duncan will be called upon to administer came into existence at the beginning of this year, and they comprise the first legislative enactments of the kind in New South Wales. In two provisions at least they show an advance upon our own factory and shop acts, first, by the compulsory providing of seats for shop assistants in the proportion of at least one seat to every three persons, and, second, by bringing all laundries under the conditions imposed upon factories. Miss Duncan is to be congratulated upon her appointment. She was the successful candidate out of 150 applications for the post.

Woman's Work In India.

Dr. Harriet E. Parker of Putney, Vt., is in charge of the Women's hospital in Madura, south India. Last year there were 18,000 cases treated in the hospital. So much more additional room is needed a large and really well appointed building is now in process of erection just across the street from the present structure. The women's board of missions in Boston has done a great deal for the hospital, and the amount of relief given the native Indian women is almost incalculable. A "Bible woman" reads regularly to the patients, and religious services are conducted every day. Leprous patients are treated in large numbers.

Various devices for holding a woman's watch securely in some convenient place have been tried with more or less success. The very latest fad of all is the tiny leather bag tag strap with a little gold buckle fastened around the belt, and from this the watch is suspended.

A GASOLINE HOISTING ENGINE.

It Does the Work of the Steam Engine Better and With Less Cost.

The use of gas and gasoline engines in mines and for all power purposes is very much on the increase. New uses for them are being found every day. They are being used quite extensively for pumping, for hoisting, and other work in mining. Mr. W. F. Patrick has an article in a recent number of the New York Engineering and Mining Journal giving experience with a gasoline hoisting engine at the Southern Eureka Mines in Utah. Mr. Patrick says:

"We have had the engine in use for some time, and have found it highly satisfactory and in the highest degree economical. We are engaged in sinking, and of course only hoisting intermittently. Our engine is rated at 25 H. P., and hoists load of 1,100 lbs. from a depth of 275 ft. in 45 seconds. Our consumption of gasoline has averaged only 0.7 gal. per hour. The amount of water consumed in cooling the cylinders is very small, as large galvanized iron cooling tanks are provided with the engine and only enough water is required to replenish what is lost by evaporation. In many of our western mining districts water for a steam plant would cost as much, or more than the fuel.

"The engine is provided with electric and torch igniters, both of which work very satisfactorily. One man can, by means of the self-starter, easily start the engine alone; after starting it requires no attention, except to see that the oil cups are feeding properly.

"By means of the operating levers near the shaft, one man can hoist, dump the buckets run out the waste, and in such work as ours, or at small mines, have time to do the tool sharpening and timber framing.

A HERCULES HOISTING ENGINE.

"The machinery is noiseless and safe. The gasoline tank is placed outside of the engine room, underground, and below the level of the engine-bed, and the gasoline is drawn up as needed by a small pump placed on one side of the engine. This arrangement prevents all possibility of explosion. In fact, I consider it safer and more economical than steam, and when the hoisting is done it can be shut down, and there is absolutely no consumption of fuel, and no possible danger of explosion."

The illustration given herewith shows a type of engine very much in use in mines throughout California, Oregon, Idaho, Arizona, Mexico, Utah, Montana, Nevada, etc. It is built by the Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, in all sizes from two to two hundred horse power. The engines are built extra heavy, hoisting drum being upon the same base as the engine, and geared direct. The levers operating the hoist are positive in action and are within easy control of the operator. About three thousand of these engines are in use in different parts of the country, and in every instance have demonstrated their superiority over any other power for the purpose used.

They are also made to burn distillate oil, which reduces the fuel cost very materially, and where water and fuel are scarce, the saving in these items quite often enables the property to be worked where otherwise the expense attendent upon operating a steam engine would preclude it.

Italian Compliments to America.

One of the Italian delegates to the international postal congress has paid America the very prettiest compliment in his power. Last Saturday evening, as Chevalier Delmati sat at dinner, a message by cable announced to him the birth of a daughter in his Roman home. The little girl is to be christened Virginia, after the state where Washington was born and where he lies buried, and if little Miss Delmati had chosen to be a boy the name of our immortal first president would have been bestowed in baptism.—Exchange.

Fishing Time.

With tulips blooming everywhere
And timid breaths of vernal air
Meandering down the dusty town
Like children lost in Vanity Fair;

When every long, unlovely row
Of westward houses stands aglow,
And leads the eyes toward sunset skies
Beyond the hills where green trees grow;

When weary seems the street parade,
And weary books and weary trade,
I'm only wishing to go a-fishing,
For this the month of May was made.

I guess the pussy willows now
Are creeping out on every bough
Along the brook, and robins look
For early worms behind the plow.

The thistle birds have changed their dun
For yellow coats to match the sun,
And in the same array of flame
The dandelion show's begun.

The flocks of young anemones
Are dancing round the budding trees.
Who can help wishing to go a-fishing
In days as full of joys as these?

"NO," said Tom Moran, "adventures don't seem to come my way. My experiences in that line would hardly be worthy of mention, but somehow Brother Bob has a genuine talent for tumbling into all manner of adventures. Brother Bob has had quite a number of pretty close calls in the wild regions in which we have traveled, but he has plenty of grit and has always been able to pull through."

Tom Moran is a miner who was graduated in the Comstock school of mining years ago and who has since had much experience in Mexico, Australia, India and other gold-producing countries.

"It is singular that you should have been able to travel through so many strange countries without a few hairbreadth escapes or some other experiences worthy of being related," said one of the old Comstock friends who were questioning Tom in regard to his travels in foreign lands. "Did you never run against a tiger while in India?"

"Tiger," said Tom, with a laugh. "Well, yes, I've run against the 'tigers' of nearly every country on the two sides of the globe."

"I am speaking now of the real, roaring, ramping Bengal tiger—the striped beast of the jungle," said the Comstocker.

"I saw quite a number of tigers while in India and went after the animals on regular hunts. I killed a few while I was there, in order to get some good skins."

"Never got into close quarters with one?"

"Well, not very; but Brother Bob had rather a bad bout with a big hill tiger up in Nepaul."

"Did Bob get away with the tiger?"

"Yes, Brother Bob is true grit; the tiger was killed."

"As you had no adventures of your own during your travels, Tom," said a Comstocker, "suppose you give us the story of Bob's tiger fight."

"I am sorry Brother Bob is not here to tell you about his battle with 'Madame Stripes,' but as he is not with us this evening, I will give you a little sketch of the affair as I saw it.

"Brother Bob and I were up on the Nepaul frontier, headed for the lower slopes of the Himalayas.

"In place of the ducks, cranes, coots and pelicans of the lagoons along the lowland course of the Koosee we now began to see quail, partridges, pea fowl, florican and other upland birds. In places hidden in patches of dense jungle and overgrown with vines and creepers were dilapidated temples indicating that the whole country had at some time been inhabited, though in the present age only a few scattered villages are to be found. Outside of the villages there are here and there huts inhabited by the 'gwalla,' or cowherd caste, and these huts of the men of the cattle stations are often in the heart of almost impenetrable stretches of jungle.

"While in this beautiful region our guns kept us well supplied with all kinds of game, and we first and last killed many wolves, jackals, leopards and about a dozen tigers, great and small. The British and wealthy natives almost always use elephants in hunting tigers, sometimes having fifty or more of the huge beasts in line; but as we were not in a position to command a supply of elephants, we did our work on foot, hiring a score or more of coolies, with tom toms, firecrackers and horns to beat through small patches of jungle. At first we mounted ourselves on 'mychans,' bamboo platforms, at the point where we expected the game to appear, but after we had learned something of the nature and ways of the tiger we did not bother with platforms, but took our chances on the ground.

"The gwallas of the region were always ready to bring us news of a tiger having killed one of their cattle, and when we got news of a 'kill' we were soon out after the killer. Often the gwallas would be able to point out the patch of jungle to which the tiger had retired after making the kill and feasting his fill.

"It was here in this foothill region that Brother Bob had his adventure with a big hill tiger. A 'shekarry,' a native expert hunter, who keeps himself well posted in regard to the movements of game and manages hunts for both British and rich natives, one day came to our camp and proposed to give us some sport. He said that as neither the English nor the native princes were hunting at that season business was very slack with him. He offered for a very reasonable price to bring out his people and beat through a piece of jungle which he knew to be alive with all kinds of game. As a part of the bargain Brother Bob and I were to kill as many wild hogs, deer and the like as we could knock over, the shekarry saying his people were all very hungry for meat.

"The particular piece of jungle selected by the old game expert to be beaten through lay between the forks of two large streams with high and steep banks. A more favorably situated jungle for sport could not have been found. As Bob and I would station ourselves near the junction of the two streams nothing could pass that way without being seen. We took stations about fifty yards apart at a point where the jungle became somewhat thin and open, each thrusting into the ground a leafy branch of parass to serve as a screen or blind. After a long wait we heard faintly in the distance the sound of the tom toms and the shouts of the beaters as they advanced into the jungle.

"Presently we heard a rustling upon the stray leaves in front, and a troop of monkeys, loudly chattering their alarm, came hopping out of the dense jungle.

"As yet we had seen no deer or other desirable game, but the beaters were still far away. Taking a peep from behind my screen, I was somewhat surprised to see a large female tiger come gliding out of the thick jungle, crouching close to the ground as she passed into the open. She was on Brother Bob's side of the jungle and was moving straight toward him, apparently more concerned about the commotion behind her than afraid of danger in front. Bob had also seen the tiger and had dropped to one knee behind his screen and leveled his rifle. Every moment I expected to hear the report of Bob's gun, as the tiger was within ten yards of his blind and was moving slowly.

"Some noise in the jungle frightened the skulking beast and, after a quick backward glance, it blindly bounded forward. At the second bound the tiger landed almost on top of Bob, as he crouched behind his fragile screen. Instantly he fired, thrusting his rifle at the beast without aim. Wounded by the shot, the tiger uttered a howl of rage, dashed aside the screen and struck Bob a blow with a fore paw that sent his gun flying and left him stretched senseless on his back.

"I rushed forward at once to Bob's assistance. As I ran the infuriated beast threw herself upon Bob and began tearing at him with her teeth. Hearing a sound as of cracking bones, I thought every rib in poor Bob's body was being crushed. As I feared to use my rifle I threw it down and drew my revolver. My yells, as I rushed on the tiger, caused her to cease tearing at Bob and fix her eyes upon me. But she still retained her position across Bob's breast while showing her teeth and snarling at me.

"I thought it probable that she was so badly wounded as not to be able to rise upon her legs and so decided to take her at close quarters and make sure of her. With my pistol in my right hand and in my left a long-bladed knife, sharp as a razor, I crept forward. I advanced crouched almost upon my knees, as the tiger's position across poor Bob was such that I feared to fire with a downward range.

"I had got up within ten feet of the tiger when she suddenly left Bob and leaped at me. The charge of the beast was a surprise, but by a backward move I avoided her leap and as she passed fired my pistol into her neck, at the same moment plunging the knife into her side up to the hilt. She fell and did not move from where she landed, the pistol shot having broken her neck.

"Seeing the tiger was in its death struggles I turned my attention to Brother Bob, who was still stretched unconscious upon the ground. The beaters were fast approaching through the jungle with great uproar and thumping of tom toms, wild hogs in droves, both black and gray, were rushing by, spotted deer were charging past and the whole jungle seemed alive with game of all kinds, some droves of wild pigs almost running over me.

"I was just stooping over Bob when a huge male tiger bounded out of the jungle and halted within ten feet of where I stood. I had my pistol upon him in an instant, and as his head was so held that a bullet would not glance from his skull I took good aim and gave him a shot between the eyes that brought him down as dead as though he had been a sheep or an ox. Seeing that the shot had killed the tiger I ran down to the river, filled my hat with water and went to work to try to restore Bob's senses. He had been badly stunned and was breathing heavily, but I saw he had no bad wounds and soon had the satisfaction to see him open his eyes, when it was not long before his wits returned and he was able to sit up. The paw of the tiger had struck him on the side of the head and knocked him senseless, but had only slightly wounded his scalp. The weight of the tiger on his chest had almost stopped his breath and he felt some internal soreness. We found that his life had been saved by a lucky chance. In a game bag he had slung to his side were some quail and a pea fowl or two, and it was these the tiger had seized upon and crunched in her blind rage, not Bob's ribs.

"Bob was much astonished and bewildered when he saw two dead tigers stretched out alongside of him. I told him that he had gone into a sort of delirium of rage and killed them both, and for a time he believed my story. He said he had an indistinct recollection of having done a good deal of fighting. We found that his shot had plowed through the muscles of the female tiger's left shoulder, only slightly wounding her, but probably paralyzing her left fore leg.

"When the old shekarry came up with his crowd of beaters he was at first much disappointed that we had killed no deer or wild pigs. 'Alas, sahibs,' cried he, 'no meat—no meat!' He, however, soon cheered up and took great credit to himself for having said there were tigers in the jungle. After the tigers were skinned we went down to the river and killed for the old fellow quite a lot of pigs. We were well satisfied with our prizes, the skins of the two tigers. The male measured, as he lay on the ground, eleven feet two inches from tip to tip and the female ten feet four inches.

"They were unusually large hill tigers, which are of heavier build than the tigers of the valleys, but average less in length. To kill tigers with a pistol was a feat before unheard of on the frontier, and obtained for us great credit for nerve, but give a tiger a square shot in the head and he will go down like a bullock. Many tigers are killed by single shots from rifles, but the man who goes after tigers on foot must have a considerable amount of nerve. I could always bet on the nerve of Brother Bob."

"THE TIGER SPRANG UPON BROTHER BOB."

STEAM AS A MOTIVE POWER.

The First Vessel So Propelled Was Invented by a Spaniard.

The application of steam as a moving power is claimed by various nations, but for the first extensive employment of it the world indisputably owes the English and the Americans. As early as 1543 a Spanish captain named Blasco De Garay showed in the harbor of Barcelona a steamboat of his own invention. The preacher Mathesius, in his sermon to miners in Nuremburg in 1562, prays for the man who "raises water from fire and air," showing the early application of steam power in Germany. An Italian engineer, G. Branca, invented in 1629 a sort of steam windmill. In England among the first notices of steam power is one contained in a small volume published in 1647, entitled "The Art of Gunnery," by Nat Nye, in which he proposes to "charge a piece of ordnance without gunpowder" by putting in water instead of powder, ramming down an air-tight plug and then the shot, and applying a fire to the breach "till it burst out suddenly." But the first successful effort was that of the Marquis of Worcester. In his "Century of Inventions," in 1655, he describes a steam apparatus by which he raised a column of water to the height of forty feet. This, under the name of "fire water work," was actually at work at Vauxhall in 1656.

The first patent for the application of steam power to various kinds of machines was taken out in 1698 by Capt. Savery. In 1699 he exhibited before the Royal Society a working model of his invention. His engines were the first used to any extent in industrial operations. In all the attempts at pumping engines hitherto made, including Savery's, the steam acted directly upon the water to be moved, without any intervening part. To Dr. Papin, a celebrated Frenchman, is due the idea of the piston. It was first used by him in 1690. The next step in appliance was made in 1705, in the "atmospheric engine" conjointly invented by Newcomen, Cawley and Savery. This machine held its own for nearly seventy years, and was very largely applied to mines. The next essential improvements on the steam engine were those of Watt, which began a new era in the history of steam power. His first improvement was the separate condenser, patented in 1769. The principal improvements that have been made since Watt's time have been either in matters relating to the boiler, in details of construction consequent upon our increased facilities, improved machinery and greater knowledge of the strength of materials, in the enlarged application of his principle of expansive working, or in the application of the steam engine to the propulsion of carriages and vessels.

Falling Walls at Fires

Mr. Charles T. Hill contributes to St. Nicholas an article on "The Perils of a Fireman's Life," in the course of which he says:

There are several kinds of falling walls, and the fireman of experience knows them well, and what to expect from each. There is one kind that breaks first at the bottom and comes down almost straight, somewhat like a curtain. This makes a big noise, but is not very much to be dreaded. Then there is another that bulges or "buckles" in the middle at first, and makes a sort of curve as it descends. This is a little more serious than the first, and has caused many fatalities. Then there is one that breaks at the bottom and comes straight out, reaching clear across the street, and remaining almost solid until it strikes; and, as an old-time fireman once remarked: "That's the kind you want to dodge."

This kind of "falling wall" has caused more deaths in the department than any other danger the firemen have to contend with. It has killed horses as well as men, and destroyed apparatus; and it is so rapid in its descent, and covers so much space, that to escape it the men have to be quick indeed.

Eighteen Miles in Three Days.

A drug firm of Bazhon Kan., a station on the Kansas City & Northwestern railroad, demands of the Kansas State Board of Railroad Commissioners that an order be made requiring that railroads give its customers better train facilities. The station is 18 miles from Leavenworth, but it takes three days for freight to be delivered at Bazhon and two days are consumed by passengers in making the round trip. The same slow time is made to and from Kansas City. It is averred that the road is to run to freeze out the merchants and to favor the Missouri Pacific. The complaint closes with the declaration that the superintendent of the road "lacks the mental ability to make a section hand."—Kansas City Star.

MISS LEPINA, EQUESTRIENNE.

Italian Girl Who Charms the World with Dashing Horsemanship.

Novel readers may remember that in one of Charles Lever's rollicking stories the hero, a dashing Irish dragoon, is made to leap his horse over a small cart in a Portuguese street. At a circus in Berlin recently Miss Pepina, a young Italian girl, performed the astonishing feat of jumping her favorite mare across an open victoria in which four men were seated. This young woman was born in Trieste, Austria, of wealthy parents, and from childhood showed great liking for horseback exercise. In her early teens she could ride much better than any woman in town, even the men finding difficulty in keeping up with her. After much urging her parents finally allowed her to appear in the Circus Vidoli at Trieste, where her daring performance soon made her such a name that to-day she commands a higher salary than any other professional equestrienne in Europe. Her chief feat, previous to the one described above, was to jump her mare over four fair-sized ponies standing side by side.

Chess Approved by the Clergy.

It is a singular fact that, while all other games of chance or skill have at one time or another been denounced by the clergy of every faith, chess alone has received their approbation, and among the best players of every land have been clergymen, priests and bishops.

SOUND REASONS FOR APPROVAL.

There are several cogent reasons why the medical profession recommend and the public prefer Hostetter's Stomach Bitters above the ordinary cathartics. It does not drench and weaken the bowels, but assists rather than forces nature to act; it is botanic and safe; its action is never preceded by an internal earthquake like that produced by a drastic purgative. For forty five years past it has been a household remedy for liver, stomach and kidney trouble.

A little thing happened down at the home of Schilling's Best tea the other day that cost the firm a clean $200.00, and the most interesting feature of the matter is that they could have got out of paying it if they wanted to—because it was a voluntary thing and no one expected them to do it.

It seems that, in the earlier part of the missing word contest, A. Schilling & Co. promised $100.00 each to the two persons who sent in the largest number of Schilling's Best yellow tickets before June 15th.

It seems fair that the consumers of the tea should get those prizes. A grocer has a better opportunity for collecting tickets; and then, too, he makes a profit on the tea. But two grocers won the prizes, and A. Schilling & Co. paid the money.

Now comes the funny part—they wanted the consumers to get $200.00, and were determined they should. So they paid another $200.00 to the two consumers who had sent in the two largest number of tickets.

That is handsome, to say the least.

EDITOR DANA GRIEVED.

He Dips His Pen In Gall and Admonishes The Tribune.

What did the Hon. Whitelaw Reid mean by his exhortation to Melville E. Stone, head devil of the Chicago Associated Press, to leave nothing undone to cripple The Sun? How could he sit in the warm sunshine of April beneath the beautiful live oaks of San Mateo county, which should inspire nothing but truth and goodness, and indite that winged messenger of malefic import, "Cripple The Sun?"

What does he want to cripple The Sun for? Is it because he was once The Sun's partner in a fast bound compact which he did not keep? Is it because The Sun continued to pay and to meet its cash obligations while he fell by the wayside, and because we kept on paying when he, Whitelaw, had defaulted? Or is he of that altruistic bent that, crippled himself, and his unhappy Tribune tenfold crippled and cast down, he would have all his neighbors crippled, too, and most of all that nearest and dearest of neighbors, The Sun?

It is fun, Whitelaw, crippling The Sun. It beats all hollow being embassador extraordinary to St. James, with three secretaries, but without the confirmation of the senate.—New York Sun.

A Valuable Package.

The great lens for the telescope of the Yerkes observatory, which has been in process of finishing in Cambridgeport, Mass., for the past five years, was recently taken to Chicago in a parlor car, the whole car being devoted to this one package of freight. The lens, weighing with its frame about 1,000 pounds, was packed in double boxes, with springs between the walls of the inner and outer casing, and it was loaded in the center of the car in order to place it where it would be the least liable to damage from vibration. Watchmen were stationed at both ends of the car. This lens is the largest in the world. It represents nearly six years of labor and is valued at $60,000. The glass came from France in May, 1892, and its cost in the rough was $20,000. The lens is 41½ inches in diameter and weighs 515 pounds. The aperture is 40 inches.

TO MOTHERS OF LARGE FAMILIES

In this workaday world few women are so placed that physical exertion is not constantly demanded of them in their daily life.

Mrs. Pinkham makes a special appeal to mothers of large families whose work is never done, and many of whom suffer and suffer for lack of intelligent aid.

To women, young or old, rich or poor, Mrs. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., extends her invitation of free advice. Oh, women! do not let your lives be sacrificed when a word from Mrs. Pinkham, at the first approach of weakness, may fill your future years with healthy joy.

MRS. A. C. BUHLER, 1123 North Albany avenue, near Humboldt Park, Chicago, Ill., says: "I am fifty-one years old and have had twelve children, and my youngest is eight years old. I have been suffering for some time with a terrible weakness; that bearing-down feeling was dreadful, and I could not walk any distance. I began the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Sanative Wash and they have cured me. I cannot praise your medicine enough."

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

TO-NIGHT.

I wonder
Where my little Love hath gone—
To what far land
Her soul hath strayed!
She was not wont to stay
So long away
From me!
But as some dove
Unto her nest,
Would, at eventide,
Creep to my breast,
And there abide
In sweet content.
I wonder
If she be not afraid,
Out there
Beneath God's fair, blue sky.
How I dream!
She is not there—
And yet, my heart will have it so.
And grieve and grieve,
Above her narrow bed.
The night is fair,
And little winds stir lovingly
The branches downward bent
Above her grave.
A lily lifts
Its chaliced cup
That birds may sup
Upon their homing way,
Above the grave but newly mown
(Oh, God! How lately sown!)
That runs across
Her quiet breast
With green, sweet feet,
And little birds are mating
(Ah, love! Our mating was so sweet!);
In the tops of crested trees
The moonlight drifts
In slanting bars
Of tranquil light
That seem to pave
A pathway upward, through the stars.
Oh, Love! My Love!
Do you know
How lonely I am to-night?

FAN FAN.

She was rather a smart young woman. He thought himself an uncommonly smart young man.

Now, between these two definitions there is a good deal of difference—both in mind, body and estate. Of course, they both had bodies—else wherefore record them in these pages? But she had the mind and he had the estate, while as for those two attributes—well, to quote Miss May Kendal, "What a world apart they are, my dear!"

Having spent all she knew on her smartest dress to go to her best party in, the necessary shoes therefor nearly broke her, and her mamma absolutely refused to advance her any more on her next quarter's allowance. But her mind was quite at ease respecting gloves and stockings, for the army had supplied her with one and the navy with the other—under cover of a little betting. Which was strictly proper, for are they not sister services?

But her fan was sadly broken. So this economical young woman spent the afternoon before this special party sitting with her back to the light to give her complexion every chance mending the improvident fan with a weak solution of gum and water. Why weak solution? Well, she knew what she was about—better than you would.

Then she dressed, feeling the while that her brushes ought to be of gold and ivory instead of plain wood; that one silk petticoat is worth two cotton ones; in short, luxury seemed to her the sweet peach which surrounds the unattainable kernel of contentment. "Who cares for the stone or its contents?" she thought, "but, O, how luscious 's the juicy fruit!"

Being a young woman of mind, you see, she quite recognized that the more artificial metaphors are at present the clearest modes of speech, though she knew better than to talk like that to her partners. Rather!

So she went with her estimable mamma, and she danced. As I hinted before, she was personable—very; and she had a taking way with her—when she liked; and she had a cool head, which is better than rubies, and sometimes leads to them, and though she did not have to live by her wits, she frequently made them afford various little additions to her toilet, and that is no small matter to a smart young woman.

So she danced and was sought after. And presently, while she was sitting out, her partner took hold of that guileless fan. In an instant it was broken, and her little cry of distress quite went to his heart. . . . Being rather impecunious himself, Schilling knew how difficult it was to raise the read' coin at every moment's notice.

"Doesn't half match your dress," he said, as she examined it carefully, saying she must try if it could be mended; "don't you bother about it. I'll send you another."

"How awfully sweet! And it's just like you to think of matching my dress." Her tone was charming.

Then presently she went in to supper with a man whom she had met two or three times, and knew vaguely as one knows quadrates of casual acquaintances. But it was only that evening she had heard him described as very rich, and it made her thoughtful. This was the young man with body and estate—he thought her uncommonly smart.

"How slippery these silks are!" she said, as they finished supper—it was a sit-down one, and of remarkable virtue. "Do you think you could pick up my fan for me—it has dropped down your side?"

He pushed back his chair and stooped. "O, it's broken!" she cried, bending too. At that moment Mr. Gould lifted his head—there was a slight collision—she blushed charmingly—he held the fan awkwardly in his hand—the sticks were smashed across.

Then that first young man passed on the other side of the table; he took in the situation, and he smiled an evil smile. She blushed again, deeply. The man of opulence stuttered

"Shall we go back into the dancing-room?" she said softly, but she did not put out her hand for her fan; so he carried it.

"I'm awfully sorry," said Mr. Gould, for the second time, when they were in the corridor.

"It was an old friend," she rejoined plaintively. "Shall we turn into the library and cremate the relics? I can't bear the idea of its being thrown on the dustheap."

When they stood by the fire he offered it to her, but she shook her head, smiling this time. "No, that is too cruel. You did it, and you must burn the poor thing."

"I'm awfully sorry," he said, for the third time. "May—er—may I not send you another?"

"O, but this was of no value, really; I can get one myself."

"No; do let me; it was all my clumsiness. Let me have your address and I'll send you one."

She hesitated, paused reflectively, till, lifting her eyes to him, she murmured, "Will you bring it then?"

She went home that evening and dreamed of having silver brushes with the most elaborate monograms procurable. But the rich young man fatuously conversed with his old schoolfellow, the poor young man, who threw himself in his way. So they became righteously indignant over the artfulness of the schemer.

"Let's send her one of those Japanese paper things," said young Schilling; "come round to my rooms; we'll find one there and do it up; with our kind regards."

"All right," said young Gould, yawning, for he was half asleep, and easily led.

So they made the parcel up together. But Schilling rather overdid his part, and Gould, at the last moment relenting, pulled his card out again, while the other had his back turned hunting the sealing-wax, and kept his own counsel. After all, he was a gentleman at heart, which the other never was, nor could be.

And the next day Gould sent her a lovely fan from the Burlington Arcade, for he was ashamed of the way they had talked about her that night; and he avoided Schilling, whom he saw in the club.

Then she wrote him such a charming little note. And then he met her unexpectedly at church parade on Sunday (it was all the church he did in those days). And three weeks later they were engaged to be married; and she had three sets of hair-brushes given her right off, and did not like any of them.

Young Schilling thinks him an awful idiot to have been taken in by a girl like that. But she is very pleased; she did not want a clever man at all. She has wits enough for both any day.

She will make a very good wife for a rich man. But young Schilling and she would have swindled everybody and come to grief in the end.—Pick-Me-Up.

A Lad Without Guile.

"He was a lad without guile," testifies General Longstreet. "I never heard him utter a profane or vulgar word. He was a boy of good native ability, although by no means a hard student. So perfect was his sense of honor that, in the numerous cabals which were often formed, his name was never mentioned, for he never did anything which could be subject for criticism or reproach. He soon became the most daring horseman in the academy. He had a way of solving problems out of rule by the application of good, hard sense," and Rufus Ingalls ends by saying: "When our school days were over, if the average opinion of the members of the class had been taken, every one would have said: 'There is Sam Grant. He is a splendid fellow, a good, honest man, against whom nothing can be said and from whom everything may be expected.'"

One of the keenest observers in his class, for a year his roommate, perceived more in him than his instructors. "He had the most scrupulous regard for truth. He never held his word light. He never said an untruthful word even in jest.

"He was a reflective mind and at times very reticent and somber. Something seemed working deep in his thoughts—things he knew as little about as we. There would be days, even weeks, at a time when he would be silent and somber—not morose. He was a cheerful man, and yet he had these moments when he seemed to feel some premonition of a great future—wondering what he was to do and what he was to become. He was moved by a very sincere motive to join the Dialectic society, which was the only literary society we had. I did not belong, but Grant joined while we were roommates, with the aim to improve in his manner of expressing himself."

Wood a d Decay.

A simple and effective way for preserving wood from decay is used in Switzerland for telegraph poles. A square tank having a capacity of some two hundred gallons, is supported at a height of twenty feet above the ground, by means of a skeleton tower. A pipe extends from the bottom of the tank to within thirty inches of the ground. This pipe is connected with a cluster of flexible branches, which end with a cap having an orifice in the center. Each cap is clamped on the lower or larger end of the pole, so that none of the liquid can escape from the pipe except by passing into the wood. The holes are arranged in parallel lines sloping downward, and the troughs run under them to catch the drippings. The tanks are filled with a solution of copper sulphate, and the wood becomes impregnated with this solution by the pressure produced by the fall. The posts are then removed and dried.

What on earth do loafers think about when they stand for hours on a street corner alone?

TO LOOK WELL A-WHEEL.

Reasons Why Many Riders Appear Awkward and Uncomfortable.

BICYCLE riding should make a woman look well instead of ill. It is all a matter of dress and the adjustment of the bicycle. All that is necessary for the ordinary woman is to get a befitting costume and then arrange the various parts of her wheel so that the machine seems a part of her as she rides it. It is not a bit harder to have a bicycle adjusted to fit than to have it adjusted so that it does not fit, and the difference in appearance is everything. In most cases the changes necessary to alter the position and appearance of a rider from bad to good can be made by raising or lowering the handle bars or the saddle, or moving the latter a little forward or a little back. In nine cases out of ten women who look and feel awkward on wheels do so because the seats and handle-bars of their machines are not properly adjusted.

The accompanying pictures show some of the many shades of difference between the right position, in which a woman may ride gracefully and easily, and the wrong positions, in which she is sure to look awkward and uncomfortable. Many women may find in these pictures, too, hints that will help them to correct their styles of riding and enable them to better enjoy an exercise which has been only half pleasurable in the past, because they did not know how to follow it.

It is easy to see what is the difficulty with the woman shown in figure No. 1, what it is that makes her look as if she were working a sewing machine rather than riding a wheel. Her saddle is too low. If it were raised to its proper height her knees would not pump up and down before her chin with every revolution like a pair of piston rods. If it were raised she would have a decidedly better appearance, her skirt would hang better, she would ride more easily and it would not be hard for her to guide her wheel, as it certainly is in the position in which she is shown.

The awkward position shown in figure No. 2 is the result of having the saddle too far back from the handle-bars, so that the rider can just reach the steering apparatus and no more and so that she has to push forward on the pedals almost as much as down in propelling her wheel. The position which that adjustment of the machine gives makes the rider look as if she were trying to keep her seat on a bucking bronco from which she was expecting to be thrown at any instant. If the saddle were brought forward a little and raised slightly the position would be good. The lady would be sitting over the pedals, too, rather than behind them, and would have enough of her weight on the handle bars to guide her machine easily and safely.

There is such a thing, however, as having the saddle too far forward and too high, as is shown in figures 3 and 4, which illustrate positions just the reverse of those in the figures explained above. In figure 3 the rider has the appearance of climbing a steep hill and of working very hard in the ascent, simply because her saddle is too low and too far forward. She has to push back on her pedals rather than down and has not room enough between the saddle and the pedals to give full swing to her knees. Raising the saddle and putting it back a little would give the rider a graceful and easy position.

The difficulty shown in figure 4 is the opposite of that in figure 1—the saddle is too high. The rider has to tip forward in order to reach the pedals when they are at their lowest point in making a revolution. That attitude is, perhaps, the most tiring that can be assumed by a rider on a long journey, as it throws the entire body out of position. The adjustment would be correct if the saddle were lowered so that the pedals and handle-bars could be reached easily and the lady would find cycling much easier and more pleasurable than she can in the attitude in which she is shown.

All that is necessary to make any of the changes suggested and to adjust wheels so that the riders can look and be comfortable rather than awkward and uncomfortable is a monkey-wrench and a little common sense. With those nearly all the changes that are necessary to put women's wheels in proper condition can be effected.

A proper position for a woman on a bicycle is shown in figure 5. The rider there sits easily and gracefully, and the work of propelling her wheel is not half the work exerted by any of the others. She not only looks well, but it is a position in which cycling exercise is play rather than labor, and beneficial rather than harmful.

Culpable Methods.

Justice seems very much out of joint when an officer of the law can enter a man's store on Sunday, represent himself as in some rather bad fix and on the strength of such representation get some article of personal necessity, and then, because the man obliges him, put him under arrest.

A few Sundays ago a policeman went into a store and, professing to be suffering from a bad cold, asked for a handkerchief, claiming that he had left his own at home. The shopkeeper declined to sell the article on the ground that he did not transact business on Sunday, but after some persuasion sold the handkerchief and took the money. Almost immediately the officer put the man under arrest. The same officer, under the pretense of wanting a clean collar because he must call upon a lady and his own was soiled, bought a collar of another man, who was also arrested.

While no man has a right to violate the law, no other man has a right to use personal and special arguments to induce him to do so. If one does a favor for another, especially if there is any risk involved in the doing, there is a moral obligation that cannot be overlooked, and a trust that nothing should be allowed to violate. A very strong sentiment is growing up among respectable people against the practice of enticing people to commit crimes or misdemeanors and then arresting them as a consequence of such acts.

Felling Mahogany Trees.

It is a whole day's work for two men to fell even the smallest mahogany tree. On account of the spurs which project from the base of the trunk a scaffold has to be erected and the tree cut off above the spurs, leaving thus a stump of the very best wood from ten to fifteen feet high.

LIFE IN A PENAL COLONY.

Delightful Place Where French Convicts Are Quartered.

"The island of New Caledonia, where I have lived for the past ten years, is a French penal colony," said C. G. Freeman, an English gentleman. "I went there for my health, expecting to stay only a short time, but went into the business of raising coffee, for which that country is well adapted, and finally concluded to stay permanently. New Caledonia is 1,200 miles east of Australia, and, although within the tropics, has a delightful climate for ten months in the year. During January and February the weather is so excessively hot that one cannot live in comfort. It is forty miles wide by 400 long.

"There are between 5,000 and 6,000 convicts on the island, and perhaps an equal number of ticket of leave men—that is, men who have served out their terms of imprisonment, but who are forbidden to leave, and have to report to the authorities twice a year. They are a miserable, spiritless lot, these ticket of leave fellows, who work just enough to keep from starvation, and whose highest ambition is to get money enough for a debauch. The convicts are treated very humanely by the French officials, and I doubt if there is a penal settlement in the world where the men have the same care and consideration shown them.

"The coffee plantations are worked largely by negroes, who come from the New Hebrides under contract to stay two or three years, the local labor being very unreliable. The pay of the laborers is $2 a month and rations, rice being the principal article of food. This cheapness of labor is the explanation of the profit in cultivating coffee. If we had to pay the wages current in the United States there would be no money in its production. We export to France and are allowed a rebate of one-half of the entry duties, which is a considerable bonus.

"There are a few Englishmen in New Caledonia, but no Americans, I believe, outside of the consul. The French are very jealous of foreigners and discourage all outsiders from coming there."—Washington Post.

Fluids with Meals.

The arguments presented by many writers seem to prove that the moderate taking of fluids with the food at meals is not without benefit. But the importance of the thorough mastication of food before it is presented to the stomach must never be overlooked. If this is interfered with in any way by the use of liquids, we must promptly prohibit their indulgence.

Fluids may be taken ad libitum during meals by those whose digestive powers will allow it, but such persons should keep in mind that the strongest stomach may be abused too far, while those whose stomachs are already unequal to a severe strain should be especially careful as to the quantity of fluid imbibed with the food.

The saliva is the best lubricator for the food while it is in the mouth, both because of its starch-digesting powers and because its alkalinity serves to stimulate a copious flow of the acid secretion of the stomach.

Any habit, therefore, which permits the entrance of food into the stomach before it is thoroughly incorporated with saliva must be pronounced pernicious in the extreme.

If we cannot afford the time necessary for masticating our food properly and incorporating it thoroughly with saliva, it would be better to take nothing but broths and similar foods. The use of water and other liquids as lubricators is not to be tolerated.

On the other hand, if we bear in mind the whole mechanism of digestion, it will readily be seen that in cases of weakness or want of tone on the part of the muscles of the stomach, when every part of the food cannot be properly presented to the action of the digestive juices, the introduction into the stomach of a moderate amount of water may be of no slight benefit. The mass of food will become more pliable, and so more easily operated upon by the weakened muscles.

Power of the Skin.

Dr. Juhl of Philadelphia has been making experiments on the absorbent power of the human skin for fluids in the form of spray. The lower extremities, according to the Philadelphia Record, were isolated from the rest of the body by a partition, the opening of which was carefully packed with India rubber, so that no fluid might pass to the rest of the body. The spray was then made to play upon the isolated extremity, and only normal skin was exposed to it, all patches which were unduly reddened being covered with gutta-percha tissue firmly fixed with chloroform.

The skin was carefully cleansed with soap and water before the commencement of the experiment, and, after the spraying, the superfluous fluid was wiped off, the leg rubbed with fat, and a close bandage applied before the limp was removed from its isolation. The drugs used were ferrocyanide of potassium, salicylic acid, salicylate of soda, iodide of potassium and tincture of iodine, and all of them were found in greater or less quantity in the wastes of the body. Alcoholic solutions were found to be absorbed more readily than the aqueous.

Lovers' Alarm Clock.

A Lone Elm, Mo., genius has invented a lovers' alarm clock. At 10 o'clock it strikes loudly, two little doors open and the figure of a man attired in a dressing gown appears, holding in his right hand a sign on which are inscribed the words "Good-night."

Mrs. Newed—"Was I nervous, dear, during the ceremony?" Miss Spitegirl—"Well, a trifle at first, darling, but not after William had said 'yes.'"—Truth.

LIVES IN A TREE TOP.

The Queer Abode of an American in Nicaragua.

Here is a man who lives up a tree. His name is H. Wildeson, an American who lives in Nicaragua. He lives in a house, but the house is up a tree, far above the ground. Mr. Wildeson's domicile is a three-story affair, built in a tree, sixty feet from terra firma. This queer house is built around the trunk. That is, the trunk runs through it like the mast of a ship. The house, while not precisely spacious, contains a kitchen, dining-room, sleeping-rooms and a bathroom, supplied with water from the rain caught in the treetops and stored there in a tank. The furniture is good, though simple, hammocks, after the fashion of the country, taking the place of beds. To get up and down between the ground and the house an elevator is used, so constructed with blocks and tackle that the person using it raises himself or controls his descent by means of a rope. The house is built of jointed boards, firmly bound by wire cable, and further secured by wire strands passing about the structure.

THE HOUSE UP A TREE.

Mr. Wildeson's idea in building this lofty and novel house was to get above the malaria. It seems to answer this purpose and has other advantages. Mosquitoes and flies will seldom rise to such a height, and the house is practically free from those forms of insect and reptile life that in this country infest houses built upon the ground. It is cool in summer, and the view which it commands is superb. Below his house, suspended from a limb, is his chickenhouse. The chickens run about on the ground through the day, picking up their living; at the end of the day they come to the elevator to be hoisted to the roost in this dangling house.

New Question of Orthodoxy.

"Shall the cow observe the Sabbath and rest from being milked on Sunday?"

This is not an irreverent fling at the Sabbatarians, not a sarcastic query, as might be imagined, but a question under serious consideration by the Scottish Sabbath Alliance. That such a question should be seriously considered by a zealous body of Sabbatarians is essentially Scotch. In no other time nor country would such a thing have been possible. Not even our own Puritans, who forbade the kissing of one's wife on Sunday, would ever have evolved such an idea as this. Leaving out of the question the fact that mankind from babyhood to old age stands in need of fresh milk on Sunday as much as on other days, every dairyman knows that nothing will ruin a cow for milking purposes more quickly and surely than irregular milking. This objection was urged, but the fanatical promoters of the scheme met it by a proposition to dock the cow its feed on that day, so that it would not produce milk, and hence would not suffer from not being milked. The pangs of hunger to be endured by the unfortunate cow were not considered. The idea was suggested by an old habit of the Welsh herders of resting their cattle on Sunday when driving them to market. Begun by pious herders and drovers, it was soon discovered that the scheme was profitable. The cattle reached their destination in better condition for the rest and brought better prices. Then the ungodly adopted the practice and it became universal. But this does not apply to the non-milking scheme, the only pleasing feature of which is that the level-headed were in the majority and voted down the further agitation of it.

Detecting Icebergs.

One way in which the crew of an ocean steamer detect the fact that they are nearing the neighborhood of icebergs is by observing the action of the propeller. The water surrounding the vicinity of icebergs is much colder than ordinary for a considerable distance around, and when the vessel enters water of such a reduced temperature the propeller runs faster. When this action is perceptibly increased without the steam power being augmented, word is sent up from the engine room to the officer on the bridge, and a close lookout is kept.

Ants.

Ants are supposed to talk. To test the matter a scientist killed one. The eye witnesses of the murder hastened away and laid their heads together with every ant they met, the result being that the latter immediately turned back and fled.

How It Was Done.

"Is Dawson of the Times-Scorpion a man of influence in your community?"

"Yes, I think so. He certainly beat me when I ran for mayor."

"Why, I thought he supported you!"

"Yes. That's what did it."—Harper's Bazar.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, EDITOR,
ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 3 1897

David Starr Jordan, President of Stanford University, rarely or never says anything without emitting some little wisdom. But nothing that he has lately undertaken to discourse to the public, in our opinion, equals in interest and strength the interviews he has given to the press with reference to his late tour of the seal islands in Bering Sea. Dr. Jordan is emphatic in his desire to force upon the United States government some argument which will arouse it to the necessity of preventing the extermination of the valuable seal herds. He says that if the government continues its present policy in Alaska—which is expressed in the words, "simply letting things take care of themselves"—it is only a question of a short time when there will not be a seal to be found in Bering Sea. The pelagic hunters are killing off the female seals as fast as they can. They do this by scouring the feeding grounds while the mothers are nursing their young. Thousands of pups are thus deprived of motherly care at a time when they most need it, and they starve to death in the rockeries. Dr. Jordan does not devote much attention to the miserable inhumanity of this method of making money. He looks at it from a purely practical standpoint, and says that unless the operations of the pelagic sealers are stopped immediately there will be nothing left of the valuable herds within the next five or ten years. "If we cannot protect the islands from England," he declares, "let us cede them to her. We may be sure that she would protect them against us." There is no doubt about this. Great Britain would never permit any nation to destroy so valuable a possession as the seal herds of Bering Sea merely in order that a few of its brutal and avaricious sealers should make money. But how to arouse the United States government to a realization of the gravity of the situation is the question. It is just exactly as Dr. Jordan says—Alaska's resources are being wasted just as rapidly as they can be. Within ten or twenty years, if the government does not take a hand in the regulation of affairs up there, all the valuable fish and fur bearing animals, which might become a source of profit for centuries, will be exterminated. Alaska will then contain nothing but "starving Indians and gold hunters." It is fortunate that a man like Dr. Jordan has this matter in charge. If anybody can harrow up the lethargic soul of Uncle Sam he can do it.

Aliens will be interested in a law passed recently by Congress requiring residents who are not citizens who acquire real property to convey such property within ten years after ceasing to be bona fide residents of the United States. In Illinois an alien, 21 years old or upwards, at the time of acquiring title to lands in that State, may hold the same for six years from and after the time of acquiring such title. If, at the time of acquiring title to lands, the alien be under 21 years, he may hold the same for six years from the time when he arrives at that age. If, at the expiration of the times named, the lands are not conveyed to a bona fide purchaser for value, or the alien has not become a citizen of the United States, an information is to be filed for the sale of the land. The proceeds of the sale go to the State treasury for the benefit of the State. Missouri has passed an act permitting aliens to take mortgages upon lands to secure the payment of a loan of money; and, in case of foreclosure and sale, to purchase and take the title to the mortgaged premises and hold the same five years, within which time they must be sold to a bona fide purchaser for value, under penalty of escheat to the State. The New York act provides that the citizens of a State or nation which confers similar privileges on citizens of the United States may take, acquire, hold and convey lands in the same manner and with like effect as a citizen of the United States; reserving, however, the rights of escheat when proceedings therefor have been instituted before the passage of the act.

Prof. Emmens, of New York City, has a better thing than the Klondike. He takes Mexican silver dollars, compresses them in a vacuum, causes a rearrangement of the molecules, thus converting the mass into argentaurum, which the United States mint buys for gold, the profit being $4 per ounce. It seems that both metals were originally alike and that the difference between them is due to the fact that the white metal had gone through less vibration than the yellow. That is, the particles composing silver had not, at a certain stage, received as much electric agitation as had the yellow particles. This beats the plan of getting gold from sea water as proposed by Prof. Pearce, and if true knocks the monometal mania out, because one can be made as good as the other.

It is reported that an English officer named Harrington has discovered in India a working telephone between the two temples of Pauj, about a mile apart. The system is said to have been in operation at Pauj for over 2000 years. Egyptologists have found unmistakable evidence of wire communication between some of the temples of the earlier Egyptian dynasties, but whether these served a telegraphic, telephonic or other purpose is not stated.

California's contribution to the world's gold supply amounted last year to over $17,000,000. Alaska last year produced $2,800,000.

William Kolju, who lately returned from the Klondike with $17,000 in gold dust, says the percentage of men who make rich strikes is no greater than in the average mining camp. "Some of the oldest settlers are poorer than when they went there, although they have worked untiringly. All the pay dirt lies at bedrock, beneath the beds of streams, and the only time it can be reached is in the winter, when the water is frozen. In summer it cannot be reached because of the water." To obtain a chance on the Klondike a man, who very likely never saw a gold field in his life, starts for Dawson City now. Arriving at Dyea he faces a savage mountain trail, upon which snow has already begun to fall. He has a ton of provisions and utensils. The Indian guides refuse to pack it even over the Chilcoot pass for less than 28 cents a pound, a sum which practically doubles its cost. As no dogs are left in the market the tenderfoot cannot be his own teamster; he must hire the Indians at their advanced price, running the risk that they will raise the figures on the way. He starts on foot through drifts. If the snow is soft he wades through it; if hard he is expected to adapt himself to snowshoes. If any rivers are open he must build a raft or boat to navigate them, taking the chances of losing his stores in the rapids. What does he know about building rafts or boats? As freezing weather has begun, the chances are, however, that he will have to walk. Fifteen miles a day through snowdrifts is excellent time, and the space to be traversed is from 750 to 1000 miles. Accounts differ as to the distance. The days grow rapidly shorter, but even when they are reasonably long they are likely to be overcast and dark. Alaska has but but fifty-six clear days in the year on an average. In midwinter the sun rises from 9:30 to 10 a. m. and sets from 2 to 3 p. m. The weather grows worse and worse after summer ends. According to Willis L. Moore, Chief of the United States Weather Bureau, "In the interior of Alaska winter begins as early as September, when snowstorms may be expected in the mountains and passes. Heading one of these storms is impossible, and the traveler who is overtaken by one of these storms is indeed fortunate if he escapes with his life." Our tenderfoot, after incredible hardships, crosses the Chilcoot and braves the long trail. There are no inns for him to rest in. At night the guides get a sheltered place behind a rock or in a ravine, and, if they can, build a fire. This bonfire process is not easy in the Arctic, which is one reason why seasoned explorers cook with alcohol and Esquimaux with whale oil. A recent home-comer from the Klondike speaks of frozen beans as his chief article of winter fare. By daylight he had no time while traveling to wait upon the slow process of cookery; by night he was exhausted and wanted to sleep. So he took frozen food and let it go at that. It was poor diet for a man who was obliged to toil for ten hours or more, and sleep, shivering, on snowy ground. He does not want any more of it. But we will assume that the tenderfoot gets through to the Canadian line. He is stopped by the customs officials and taxed from 25 to 60 per cent on everything he brings into the country. His beans and bacon, costing market rates in San Francisco have paid ocean freight to Dyea and Indian freight over the divide, and now are made to yield revenue to the Canadian government. They are expensive luxuries when finally landed. The tenderfoot finds himself in a log city. He can live at a tavern for $12 per day or build himself a log house. As he never drove a nail in his life he has to hire carpenters at $15 per day, and as they are not in the country for their health they make a long job of it. Finally, with pockets sadly depleted he moves in. When the innocent gold-hunter looks about him he finds that the only way to get a claim on the Klondike is to buy it and the cheapest one costs $50,000. He may have $500 left; perhaps but $100; possibly less. The plentiful gold he had been hearing about, if above ground at all, is packed away with an armed man guarding it. If he wants any nuggets he must find them for himself. Where? The old settler points vaguely to the frozen hills and says: "Go along and find a creek. Everything is taken up for fifty miles around, but you may get something further away. What shall you do when you find it? First pay the government location tax. Then just move a hundred tons of ice to one side. Below that you will find twenty feet of frozen mud. Merely thaw it and toss it out. Near bedrock you will see gravel. Perhaps there is gold in it and perhaps not. That's a chance you take. Just pile the gravel up and in the spring you can wash it out. You can't do so before because all the water will be ice. What if there is no gold in it, or not enough to pay? Oh, then you won't be any worse off than hundreds of others. You can hire out to other people if the alien labor law will let you, and work around until another freeze comes. What's that? You say your provisions won't outlast another winter? Why, man, why didn't you bring more, then? Did you take this for a picnic?" These are frozen facts winter gold-hunting in the Northwest Territory. If they are not sufficiently frozen, they will be, along with the tenderfoot who disregards them, when the mercury at Klondike gets well on the downward path to 60 degrees Fahrenheit.

Silver mining property at the rate at which it can be bought now is considered by shrewd and far-seeing men a good investment. Capital is not slow in finding auspicious chances for investment. It generally manifests itself as peculiarly alert. There is scarcely any doubt that the very men who have united in a concerted movement to beat down the price of silver are buying silver producing mines in anticipation of a future rise—of a rise they will assist in bolstering up before long.

The latest idea in metallurgy is an ore reduction works on wheels—a reduction plant on a train of cars, each car being devoted to the process or carrying necessary machinery for treating ore; cars containing the business manager, assayer and others. As embodied in the scheme of the Railway Gold Mining Company, headquarters at Chicago, the President of this concern writes that the plant will be in Prescott, Ariz., this month, in the interest of another equally gorgeous company, with a view of purchasing gold properties. The cars will be run to any specified railroad point in good mining districts. The first cars will contain amalgamation and concentration plants, but the company can and will, if necessary, send out special cars, covering all forms of lixiviation, chlorination, cyanide and other processes; also a car for for smelting, a car containing a diamond drill outfit, and a car containing an assay outfit, the whole accompanied by a mining expert, business manager, etc. Some of the Arizona miners ought to be able to have some fun out of this thing.

The Great Indian mutiny which threatens to involve Great Britain in one of the most disastrous imbroglios of her colonial history and which may make many changes in the map of her possessions; may at the same time prove a great blessing to the American farmer. India is his great rival on the continent of Europe, as well as in the United Kingdom, for the contract to furnish food for the masses. India's labor is cheap. In normal times, therefore, it is India which stands between the American farmer and dollar wheat. It is the planting season now, and the American farmer was about to see his rival again in the field when the great mutiny was begun. The laborer is casting aside his sickle and taking up his sword. The continent of Europe must again look to America for its breadstuffs.

The last Congress wisely passed a law making it an offense for any express company or common carrier to transport from one State into another, or into a territory, any lewd, lascivious or obsene book, print, picture or design, or any article forbidden the mails because of its immoral character, or any book, circular, card or letter giving information how and where such articles may be procured. A glance at any of the nude papers and police gazettes of the day, which pass freely through carriers' hands, will show that this law is flagrantly violated. Federal officials might score a point by making arrests and testing the virtue of the new law. It needs enforcement for the protection of the young and foolish.

The scheme to invade the Klondike by means of electric sleighs, lighted and warmed, upholstered and glittering with varnish, is a beautiful one. It is not stated that the equipment of each sleigh is to include library, barber-shop, bath and billiard room, but these features might as well be added. Doubtless such sleighs could ride through the icy wilderness as easily and smoothly as a bicycle could chase itself along the serrated spine of the continental divide, a luxury to the sleighers and a sight to cheer the heart of a polar bear.—Call.

It looks as though the coal mine strikers are likely to win. The operators, after having strained the powers of the courts to the limit and having had the willing assistance of all the peace officers, have at last announced that they will propose arbitration. A few days ago they were going to run their mines by force come what would. Now they are willing to talk the matter over. As coal is getting so scarce that iron and steel works are closing down, the strikers appear to have the best of it.

A great earthquake occurred in Japan August 5th. It lasted eight minutes, and was followed by a tidal wave which swept up rivers flowing into the sea and causing great destruction. Up to August 10 it was known in Yokohama that over 5000 houses had been inundated or washed away. Between 200 and 300 people were known to have been drowned or seriously injured.

A miners' inch of water is the fiftieth part of a cubic foot per second of flow. To find out how much water one would get in 24 hours, multiply the number of inches by the decimal .14961 and that product by 86400 and you have the result in gallons. Don't forget to point off five figures. The miners' inch in California is a fixed quantity.

In the long Arctic nights there is a constant difficulty in keeping awake. Greely had to make very strict rules to keep his men awake. Beds were not allowed to be made, and the men were compelled to get up and move about.

The Southern Pacific has put all the men in its shops at work at nine hours a day.

County Clerk Hession went to Bishop this morning.

Jas. Jones came down from Fish Springs yesterday.

R. W. Thomas of Big Pine was a visitor in town yesterday.

Charley Summers was down from Bishop last Saturday.

Next Thursday Admission Day; legal holiday: California's forty-seventh birthday.

J. Tucker has taken a "lay-off" for a few days and with his family is camping on Town creek.

June Smith of Big Pine passed through town yesterday morning with a 12-animal team, en route for Los Angeles.

Mrs. Fannie F. Baker and her son, Willie Baker, were at Independence last Monday on business in the Land Office.

Misses Carrie Wonacott and Ella Huckaby came down from Bishop last Sunday evening and are visiting in town.

The summer of 1897 is a thing of the past. The weather took a decided change on Wednesday and is now cool enough for a fall overcoat.

Frank Sherrer, who is a stepson of E. Robinson of this town, was admitted to practice law in the Supreme Court of this State last week.

Hon. T. B. Rickey, accompanied by Ray Crowell, arrived at Independence last Monday from Carson, having driven through with their own conveyance.

Sheriff Given and George Naylor made a trip to Sawmill lake early in the week, after some of the 15-pound trout. It was Sunday, however, and all of the big fellows were at services.

Mrs. J. C. Irwin arrived home Tuesday morning from a month's visit to Santa Monica, Los Angeles and other points of interest in Southern California. She was accompanied by her neice, Miss Pansy Loomis, of El Paso, Texas.

M. Newman and Fred Manuel arrived at Independence from Los Angeles on Tuesday morning. Mr. Newman spent some time here last spring and became interested in the Mazourka Canyon country and determined to thoroughly prospect the main canyon for placer. He returned to Los Angeles and formed a company for that purpose. Mr. Manuel is an expert placer miner and is now on the ground for the purpose of making a thorough study of the situation. It is proposed to run a drain tunnel about 1600 feet in length and then drift up the canyon on the bedrock, and it is expected to develop sufficient water for sluicing purposes. The surrounding gulches emptying into Mazourka have been found to be very rich in placer gold and a great deal of gold has been taken out with dry-washers, there being no water that high up for sluicing. It is hoped, and there is very reasonable ground for the belief, that the main canyon will be found to be extremely rich. Mr. Newman has sufficient means at his disposal to make a decisive test as soon as he decides at what point to begin.

Last Monday James Leander Cathcart Sherwin, the venerable Round Valley oracle, was here with his fruit team, and was commissioned to take away with him Radcliffe's roan pony. He looked around and found a pony of that color in Burkham's stable, and towed it away, no doubt presuming that one roan pony is just as good as another. Our keen P. M. got onto the mistake, and mounting Dr. Keable's racehorse "Pickpocket," went in pursuit, overhauling the oracle a mile out of town. Of course, it was all a mistake and was soon explained.—Bodie Miner.

Western beef buyers will find the supply limited in Nevada next winter if they don't tie them up, as the eastern buyers are taking everything in sight and paying top prices.—Hawthorne Bulletin.

Henry Werner Dead.

Notwithstanding some grounds for hope of his ultimate recovery, Henry Werner, the miner who had his skull fractured by a blast in Shepherd's Canyon about three weeks ago, died on Sunday last. He was a native of Germany, 61 years of age, and came to this county two years ago from Esmeralda County, Nev., where he had resided for the past twenty years or more. He was a member of Woodland Lodge No. 111, I. O. O. F., and was on Monday last buried by the Odd Fellows of this place, with all the solemn and impressive honors of the Order, as befitting a member and a man well respected by all who knew him. From J. W. Lacey, who went out to inquire into the facts of the accident and bring the man in for treatment, we learn that first accounts of the matter received were mainly wrong in implying that the partner of the deceased, a Mr. Davis, was in anywise to blame for the unfortunate occurrence. They were working at different openings on the ledge some fifty feet or more apart. Werner had charged two holes and after lighting the fuse had got out to the mouth of the open cut when he called "fire." One shot exploded in an instant later. Werner was thrown out and ran some twenty or thirty feet down the steep trail to the point where he fell and was picked up. Mr. Davis and all others around there did everything for the unconscious man possible under the circumstances, and we are glad that present information enables us to rectify an injustice done to Mr. Davis.

Death of C S Williams.

C. S. Williams, an old resident of Kern county, died at Georges Creek on Wednesday. Mr. Williams had been in poor health for some time and left Kern county about a month ago on a camping trip, accompanied by his wife and a hired man. They reached Independence last Friday and spent several days here resting and visiting with Judge Lamar, starting home Wednesday. They had stopped at Georges Creek for lunch, when Mr. Williams had an attack of heart-failure and died instantly. Dr Blair and Judge Lamar were sent for and the remains were brought to Independence and interred in the Odd Fellows cemetery yesterday. Mrs. Williams was prostrated by the suddenness of her husband's death, and will return to Bakersfield by stage as soon as she is able to travel. Judge Lamar and others rendered every possible assistance to the grief-stricken widow, and the funeral was largely attended.

It Saves the Croupy Children.

SEAVIEW, Va.—We have a splendid sale on Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, and our customers coming from far and near speak of it in the highest terms. Many have said that their children would have died of croup if Chamberlain's Cough Remedy had not been given.—KELLAM & OURREN. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

There is a concerted movement to reduce miners' wages in Montana. If the men will not submit, it is said there will be an extensive shut-down. The Anaconda mine alone employs more than 3000 men.

The bill permitting private postal cards failed to pass Congress, and nothing but printed circulars and cards are mailable at the one cent rate.

Nicaragua is the newest gold field. That's better than Alaska, as there is no panger of freezing, and good things to eat are plentiful and cheap.

A Cure for Bilious Colic.

RESOURCE, Screven Co., Ga.—I have been subject to attacks of bilious colic for several years. Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy is the only sure relief. It acts like a charm. One dose of it gives relief when all other remedies fail.—G. D. SHARP. For sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

While reprinting a late article from the INDEPENDENT about the necessity and probability of future extension of the Randsburg Railway northward through Panamint Valley, the Redlands Citrograph extends the scheme southward. It says: "Kramer, on the Santa Fe Pacific railroad is only 60 miles north and 20 miles west of Redlands. It is from Kramer that the Santa Fe Pacific company will build northerly to Randsburg and Johannesburg. What is to prevent a southern connection from Kramer via Santa Fe Pacific to Barstow, and the Southern California to San Bernardino? The distance is about one hundred and twenty miles, but this could be shortened to seventy miles by building south from Kramer directly across the Mojave desert to the mouth of the Cajon Pass at or about Hesperia. The opening of the great mining belt referred to by the INDEPENDENT, with its practically inexhaustible supply of high and low grade ores, would afford freight for ore trains as numerous as were run from Virginia City and Gold Hill to the mills on the Carson river in the palmy days of the Comstock lode. A railroad to the north to reach these mines and a railroad connection to the south to haul their ores to great smelting works, on the Santa Ana river—run by electricity generated by the great water-powers of the San Bernardino mountains—is all that is required. Less than two hundred miles of railroad haul from mines to reduction works. It is practical and will surely prove the best-paying railroad project in all the great west."

A State Convention of the Silver Republican party will be held at Los Angeles on the 9th inst.—Admission Day. It don't appear that the silver issue is very much dead.

THE TEXAN RANGERS.

The Force Now but a Shadow of What It Was.

In the appropriation bill which the legislature of Texas was recently called in extraordinary session to consider is an item which provides for the maintenance of the ranger force. It will not exceed $25,000, and the smallness of the sum emphasizes the decadence of an arm remarkable for its singularity and efficiency. There is nothing exactly similar among the forces of the world. The mounted constabulary of South Africa bears, perhaps, a closer resemblance than any other, though there are wide divergences.

The Texas ranger wears no uniform. His dress is composed of stout, dark trousers, sometimes protected by overalls, a woolen shirt, heavy sack coat, sombrero, boots, stout gloves and spurs. His arms are a single action 45 caliber colt's six shooter and a winchester carbine—not rifle. He furnishes his own horse and bedding. If the horse is killed in action, the state replaces it. If it dies or is stolen, the ranger must get another. The pay is $30 a month for privates, $40 for sergeants, $75 for lieutenants and $100 for captains. The state feeds them. Their supplies include flour, coffee, sugar, lard, bacon, beef, mutton and canned goods. They slay much game and add variety to the bill of fare in that way.

Owing to the settlement of the frontier and the gradual establishment of law and order the ranger force has steadily decreased for some years past. Formerly it consisted of six companies, numbering approximately 100 men each. Today there are not more than 50 men in the service, all told, nor are they of so high a class as those who risked their lives back in the eighties. In those days the composition of the companies was unique. No native Texans were in the ranks. They were not enlisted because it was feared that their home affiliations would interfere with their work. The men came from all sections of the union, lured by the spirit of adventure.

Many of them were collegians. In Company F 15 years ago were two graduates of Yale, one of Harvard, one of Princeton, three from the University of Virginia and a dozen from the smaller southern and western universities. Some of them now are high in political place in the state of their adoption. Others sleep in the sandy stretches that sweep down to the tawny river, and even their graves have been leveled by the constant winds.—Exchange.

Strange Fish From the Bermudas.

Dr. E. H. Bean, the superintendent of the New York aquarium, returned from the Bermudas recently and brought with him several interesting specimens of fish peculiar to Bermudan waters. There were beautiful flatfish, with opal bodies, tinged with rainbow hues, including purple, crimson, bright green and bright blue. They are known as angel fish and are to the finny tribe what the gorgeous plumed peacock is to the fowl creation.

There was a slate colored flatfish, which Assistant Superintendent Spencer called a surgeon, or doctor fish, and of which little is known.

Another tank contained groupers, whose sides are striped like those of tigers and leopards.

There were also ten hind fish, each from 10 to 15 inches in length. The bodies are white, with brown and red spots. Two squirrel fish, each 10 inches long, were included in the collection. They are similar to our goldfish, excepting that their eyes resemble those of squirrels.

Three Berlin artists, Max Liebermann, the head of the naturalistic school; Richard Friese, the animal painter, and Peter Breuer, the sculptor, were recently the recipients of the large gold medal for distinction in art conferred by Kaiser Wilhelm this year.

The Winner

of one of those $100 prizes got her yellow tickets in this way:

1. By using the tea herself.
2. By asking some friends who use the tea to give her their tickets.
3. By inducing some friends to try the tea and give her their tickets.

One of her friends kept a boarding house, and sent her lots of tickets.

Haven't you some friend who keeps a boarding house or a restaurant, or who has influence in some hospital or other public institution? They need good tea there.

A New Foe to American Trees.

Specimens of a strange caterpillar discovered this spring on pear trees in Cambridge, Mass., are pronounced by Prof. Samuel Henshaw to be the "goldtail,' or euproctis chrysorrhea, hitherto unknown as an inhabitant of this country, although it is found in England, and is "abundant in Central and Southern Europe." When numerous, these caterpillars are very destructive, feeding on such trees and plants as the apple, pear, plum, hawthorn, bramble, elm, willow, beech, oak, hazelnut and hornbeam. At present the invaders in Massachusetts are said to be confined to a limited area in Somerville and Cambridge. The first specimens seem to have made their appearance a year ago, and thus far they have confined themselves to pear and apple trees. How they got across the ocean nobody apparently knows. It is suggested that by vigorous measures they may be stamped out.

Mysterious Glass Balls.

The small island of Billiton, between Sumatra and Borneo, has long been famous for its rich tin mines, which are controlled by the Dutch Government. In describing the geology of Billiton before the Royal Academy of Sciences in Amsterdam recently, Mr. Verbeek gave an account of the mysterious "glass balls of Billiton," which are found among some of the tin ore deposits. They are round, with grooved surfaces. Similar balls are occasionally found in Borneo and Java, as well as in Australia. Mr. Verbeek thinks they cannot be artificial, and there are no volcanoes near enough to support the theory that they are volcanic bombs. Besides, he says, the glassy rocks produced by the nearest volcanoes are quite different in their nature from the material of the balls. He suspected that the mysterious objects were ejected, ages ago, from the volcanoes of the moon, and afterward fell upon the earth.

Natural Lightning-Rods.

The tall Lombardy poplar has a reputation in some parts of Europe as a kind of natural lightning rod. Investigations recently made by Dr. Hess in Switzerland appear to confirm this reputation of the tree. Its wood is an unusual good conductor of electricity as compared with others, while its great height and lack of spreading branches enable it to conduct a lightning stroke straight downward. In order, however, that a poplar tree may serve to protect a building, according to Dr. Hess, its foliage should be allowed to grow as near the ground as possible; it should be removed not less than six or seven feet from the nearest wall. No metallic objects on the building should be near the tree, and its roots should penetrate a moist soil.

Desert Rattlesnakes.

In the sand wastes of Southern California two varieties of rattlesnakes are found. The larger ones, called "tiger rattlers," sometimes attain a length of four feet, but it is said that they are sluggish, and far less dangerous han a smaller variety named the "side-winder." This name comes from the snake's habit of moving sidewise, as well as advancing in the ordinary manner. It is also called the "horned rattlesnake," on account of the horn-like protuberances over its eyes. It seldom exceeds a foot and a half in length, but its motions are very quick, and it has the reputation of being "vicious.'

Dust Storms that Bury Forests.

Some Russian travelers in Tibet, describe the wonderful storms of dust that occur in Kashgaria near the foot of the Kuen-Lun Mountains. The dust in the air is sometimes so dense that complete darkness prevails. Occasionally rain falls during such a storm, but the rain drops evaporate during their descent, and the dust carried with them falls in lumps. Entire forests of poplar trees are buried in dust hillocks forty feet high. These deposits of dust are afterward moved on by the wind, but the trees that have been buried die, even after their disinterment.

Whales as Travelers.

Mr. William H. Dall, of the Smithsonian Institution says, in Science, that "during the early days of the whale fishery several well-attested instances occurred of whales struck in one ocean, as the Atlantic, being afterward killed in the North Pacific, and vice versa." This would indicate that some whales are great travelers, for to get from the Atlantic to the North Pacific they would have to go many thousands of miles, passing either around Cape Horn, or around the northern end of North America and through Bering Strait.

Built-up Wood.

There has come into use a method of "building up" boards by gluing or cementing together thin slabs of wood of different kinds, so placed that the grain of the various pieces is crossed. It is claimed that not only extra strength, but also extra flexibility and durability are thus obtained. Doors made of the prepared wood are said to be stronger than much thicker doors made of ordinary wood, and they do not warp. Packing-boxes and trunks are also made of this material.

Powdered Coal as Fuel.

For some years past there have been experiments with coal dust and pulverized coal of various degrees of fineness, with a view to ascertaining how much saving of fuel there is in using coal in this fine state. It has been demonstrated that with suitable feeding machinery the saving may amount to over forty-five per cent. above the coal fed on ordinary fire bars. This point is reached in a cupola furnace of the most approved contruction. There are several methods of burning coal dust. One is the use of a feeding apparatus consisting of rotary brushes that throw the dust into the fire-box in a continuous shower. This, of course, renders the fuel supply independent of dampness or the possibility of clogging up. Another plan is to drive the dust into the furnace by powerful currents of air. It seems to matter but little how the dust is fed. There is a manifest economy in its use, and as soon as the proper dust-feeding machinery is perfected the fuel problem will be much less difficult to struggle with.

SOME KANSAS TALL STORIES.

Munchausen Humor of the Sunflower State.

Several stories which the reader can or cannot believe, just as he sees fit, were started after the State law in reference to the malicious destruction of property and departed for parts unknown. Probably the best one was this: A man was riding along on horseback with a jug of whisky tied with a strap to the saddle horse. After the blow had ceased the jug handle was found inside the jug and the strap was sticking out of the nozzle, the jug having been blown inside out without spilling a drop of liquor.

Here is another pretty fair one: A farmer was ploughing around an oblong patch of ground one day, and at night the tract of unploughed land still contained about five acres. When he quit for the day he left the plough sticking in the furrow, as farmers often do. The tornado came along and caught the plough, taking it around and around the land until it was all ploughed.

A Kansan abroad recently found a crowd that did not seem to appreciate his conversation, so he pulled out his stock of tornado stories hoping to attract attention.

"I saw a cyclone once," said he, "that picked up a strawstack and moved it a mile and put it back, straw on straw, as it was."

Two or three of the auditors yawned and the Kansas man tried it again.

"Another time," said he, "I saw a twister suck sixty gallons of molasses out of a barrel in front of a grocery store and distribute it to every family in town who had a bucket out on the back step for the milkman."

He cleared his throat and began again: "Back in the seventies we had a terrible cyclone in Western Kansas. It blew the cracks out of the fences, pulled a cistern out of the ground, moved a township line and changed the day of the week."

This last fusillade induced one of the listeners to speak up. He said: "I do not know much about cyclones, but once when I was at sea I saw a waterspout pick up tons and tons of water and carry it a mile and"——

"Hold on," cried the Kansan. "If you are going to degrade this conversation to the level of a common lying contest I will retire." And he got up and walked away pompously.

A prominent Kansan is accredited with telling this:

"Tell you what's a fact. I have known it to blow twelve days and nights on a stretch and hold a sheep up against the side of the barn until he starved to death."

Couldn't Spank Her Son.

People never get an encouragement for doing the good samaritan act in the interests of the public, as the man decided who offered to assist a distracted woman and ameliorate the sufferings of a lot of respectable people on a suburban car.

The boy who howls was in evidence, the curled darling of his only own mother and the terror of everybody else, and he had kept the car in a state of wild excitement and exhausted the patience of everybody, including his doting parent.

"Oh, if your father were only here!" she had said for the fiftieth time, as she tried vainly to restrain the howling terror.

At that he stopped howling long enough to beat the air with his small shins, and the woman on the other side of him remarked audibly that a cage was the proper place for savages like him.

"Johnny dear," asked his mother, "won't you be a good boy?"

Roars and kicks from Master Johnny.

"Oh, I wish your father were here to give you a good trouncing this very minute!" she wailed as she struggled with him.

Then it was that the philanthropist of the company asserted himself. He had been trying in vain to read his morning paper ever since he started from home.

"Allow me, madam," he said, blandly; "I am a father myself, and I will be happy to chastise your cherub in behalf of his absent parent."

"Oh, no, you won't, not if I know it!" said Johnny's mother, rising in her wrath like a tigress. "There ain't that man living dare lay a finger on that boy—his own father or any other ugly old catamount who thinks he knows it all," and she effectually shut off debate by going into the next car and taking the sweet infant with her.

The Wife in Russia.

"This is a curious custom you Americans have of referring to your wives by their husband's names," observed Glanvock Kaplon, an intelligent Russian traveler. "I suppose the American holds his wife in as high esteem as the Russian holds his, but if at home I should speak of my better half as Mrs. Kaplon my friends would at once conclude that my domestic relations were not as pleasant as they should be, and that I was thinking of a legal separation. When I first heard an American speak of his wife as Mrs. Jones, for example, I felt almost like presuming on my acquaintance by intruding into his private affairs and asking him what the trouble was at home. Yet I soon learned that the custom was universal over here, but still I cannot get used to it. 'My wife' is the plain, blunt way I speak in Russia of the lady who, I suppose, I would have to call Mrs. Kaplon in polite society in America. In some of the more fashionable circles of St. Petersburg this American social custom has been adopted, though I was told by a prominent government official not long ago that the Czar disapproved of it."—St. Louis Republic.

The Vital Force.—The universe is no longer a mere mechanism, the scene of conflicting forces. Now we know that there is but one force, one life, and that life is God's. Matter is no longer impure. It is the same here that it is in the glittering star overhead.—Rev. Minot J. Savage, Unitarian, New York City.

Politics.—An absolute merit system in which every official, up to and including the President of the United States, should be chosen by examination, would not insure purity in politics so long as vast wealth unites to bribe and office holders are willing to be bribed.—Rev. IN MEMORY OF FIREMEN.

Monument to the Cold Storage Warehouse Fire Victims.

The greatest tragedy of the Columbian exposition year occurred July 10, 1893. The destruction by fire of the cold storage warehouse near the World's Fair grounds entrance at 64th street made the one great day of horrors at the fair. Fifteen men lost their lives before a helpless mass of thousands unable to succor them, or received such injuries that they died within a few hours after the fire.

The courageous efforts of the firemen to save the building, their reckless heroism and the death they met have been commemorated by a handsome monument in Oakwoods cemetery, where the remains of some of the victims lie grouped together. The monument is a tribute to the dead by the fire department of Chicago. The shaft is of granite. The base is twelve by twelve feet. At the top the monument measures ten by ten feet, and is ten and a half feet high. It is an imposing shaft, massive and simple in design, a fireman's helmet resting on a coping being the only suggestion of the idea the tomb would seek to convey. On the polished face of the monument, toward the rising sun, the names of those who died at the fire are chiseled deep in the enduring granite.

MONUMENT TO FIRE VICTIMS.

Ocean's Great Business.

A diving bell, consisting of a thick, hollow cube of about six feet and weighing rather more than ten tons, was recently lowered into water 200 feet deep, with strong timbers attached to it, in order to test its strength. After the bell had reached the bottom it was noticed that the timbers came up in splinters, and when the bell was pulled up it was crushed out of all recognition of its former shape. The water pressure was calculated to be 353,924 pounds on each side, and a resulting pressure of every 1,360 tons on the cube.

A STRANGE DISCOVERY.

A Petrified Wooden Cross Found Imbedded In a Rock.

Recently there was unearthed in the stone quarries of Ira W. Logan, at the junction of the Ohio and Beaver rivers, near Pittsburg, a petrified wooden cross. It is 18 by 24 inches in dimensions and was imbedded in the surface of a massive limestone rock which had been blasted from the quarry cliff.

The formation of at least a century's growth of limestone was above the point where the rock containing the cross was taken. The cross is supposed to have been the property of a Jesuit missionary and was evidently planted to symbolize the Christianization of the early Indian tribes.

Historians say it is a relic of the famous trip made by Celeron, the celebrated French commandant, who explored the Alleghany and Ohio river valley in 1749. Numerous parties of Indian relic searchers have hunted for traces of the expedition, but beyond the finding of one iron plate it is said nothing has been discovered. The cross will be presented to the Carnegie museum.—Chicago Times-Herald.

Thirteen a Fatal Number to Him.

There was hanged at Decatur, Ga., recently a young man whose fate will give rise to considerable discussion among superstitious folk. His name was Terrell Hudson, and he believed that he was driven to the gallows by the number 13.

In support of this belief he brought forward the following array of facts: He was the thirteenth child of his parents; was born on the thirteenth day of the month, and was given a name in which there are 13 letters. On the 13th of last November he quarreled with a 13-year-old boy named Malcolm, and on the 13th of last February he was sentenced to die.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

ABOUT IRREGULARITY.

The balance wheel of a woman's life is menstruation.

Irregularity lays the foundation of many diseases, and is in itself a symptom of disease. It is of the greatest importance that regularity be accomplished as soon as possible after the flow is an established fact.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the greatest regulator known to medicine. "My health became so poor that I had to leave school. I was tired all the time, and had dreadful pains in my side and back and head. I was also troubled with irregularity of menses, and lost so much flesh that my friends became alarmed.

TRIALS IN CHINA.

Cruelty Characterizes Celestial Administration of Justice.

That the tender mercies of the Chinese are cruel is one of those axioms which need no proof; and a case which was lately reported illustrates in a striking manner the extraordinary indifference to human life and suffering which characterizes both this callous people and their ruthless governors. The case in point was reported to the Throne by Liu-Pingchang, the ex Viceroy of Szech uan, who states that within his jurisdiction there dwelt a family of the name of Wu, the implicated members of which were the grandfather, father and son. On the occasion in question the patriarch Wu attended a neighboring market to make purchases and to have his wood-cleaver sharpened. When starting on his mission he noticed that his grandson was unemployed, and being of a frugal turn of mind he bade him accompany him and take some of the home-farm produce for sale. This apparently disturbed the irascible temper of the young man, who took the opportunity of being in the neighborhood of a wine-shop to take a great deal more of the local spirit than was good for him. He was not so tipsy, however, as to be unable to carry the oil-basket and bamboo-pole which were among the purchases which his grandfather had made. On the way home the elder Wu took the opportunity to rebuke him for his intemperance, a proceeding which so enraged the youthful scion of the house that he snatched from the old man the cleaver which he carried, and knocked him down with a terrible blow on the neck. The spot where the old man fell happening to be rocky, the jagged edges of the stones completed the deed of murder, and he never moved again. Horrified at the consequence of his crime, the grandson cast about for means of disposing of the body, and remembering the oil-basket, he dismembered the corpse, and having packed the remains in the basket, carried it off and threw it into a neighboring pond. He did not succeed, however, in doing this without having been observed. A certain neighbor named Tso had seen him throw the basket into the water, and finding him flushed and excited, plied him with such searching questions that Wu ultimately confessed his crime. At the same time he bound Tso to secrecy, and threatened that if he revealed the murder he would charge him with having been an accomplice. Tso vowed that not a syllable relating to it should pass his lips, and then went off and reported the whole affair to the son of the murdered man and the father of the murderer. Horror-stricken, the father laid the whole matter before the magistrate; the case was tried, the murderer made a full confession—in answer to what tortures we are not told—and then came the question of the sentence.

Liu-Pingchang recommended that the prisoner should be put to death by the "slow and lingering process," which consists of the culprit being tied to a cross and being then sliced in the fleshy parts of the body with the number of cuts which the judge considers meet the circumstances of the case. This sentence the Emperor confirmed; but the Chinese sense of justice forbade Liu to stop there. By most people it would be thought that the father of the murderer acted with laudable promptitude, and, considering his relationship, with a very full sense of what was right. But Liu, interpreting the national theory of interdependence, held that the father should not be allowed to escape scot-free, as he had proved himself incapable of bringing up his son in the way he should go, and he expounded the law by saying that, as in the case of a wife who murders her father or mother-in-law, the husband should receive forty blows on the execution ground, should then, kneeling, be made to gaze on the infliction of the slow and lingering process on his errant wife, and at its close receive another forty blows, so in this case the father should suffer like penalties. To this, likewise, the Emperor assented, and the gruesome scene was enacted with the full letter of the law.

A Cycle Postal Service.

With reference to the utilization of the bicycle for postal service in the West Australian gold fields, a correspondent of the St. James' Budget in Sydney, N. S. W., writes as follows: "Such a post was established in 1894, and ran up to 1896, but is now discontinued owing to the extension of the government mails to most of the outlying districts. As an interesting memento of the cycle postal service I beg to inclose for your acceptance one of the stamps used on letters carried by wheelmen."

Would Larrup the Kids.

A Chicago Record correspondent writes: Has the world so progressed in refinement that young people acquire self-control by intuition? It would seem that that is the belief of the school board of this city. A stranger visiting the lower-grade room in our public schools sees a refined, well-educated young woman placed in charge of fifty or more young children—half of them young "toughs," gathered off the streets, many of them coming from homes where "rushing the can" and family fights are common occurrences. These children have no respect for anybody or anything outside of the cuffs and kicks they receive at home and in their daily struggles for supremacy on the streets and in alleys. Now, how can these children, coming under the influence of moral suasion for five hours a day five days out of seven, having no fear of consequences, learn that most essential element of manhood or womanhood—self-control? Moral suasion is a very good thing, but first we must have something to work upon. We never can expect to have good, law-abiding citizens under the present system of training the young. There ought to be a special room, with a special teacher, who has the power to punish. How can a teacher do her best for the good children when all her force is used up in trying to coax the unruly ones to behave well when they know she can't enforce obedience? ONLOOKER.

THE SNORING HABIT.

Fearful Trials of a St. Louis Wife Told in Court.

A worthy St. Louis woman is applying for a divorce on the grounds that her husband snores so that she cannot sleep o' nights. She has, she says, put up with this habit with all wifely patience for many years, but the time has come when she feels that she has some rights, and one of these is the right to sleep. This has been denied her by reason of Mr. Johns'—Johns is his name—snoring habit. According to her story, he begins his snoring as soon as he has read his evening newspaper a few minutes. This, of course, is excusable in anyone who has to read a St. Louis newspaper. It is said that the people of that city fall into a gentle doze just after reading the morning journals and again in the evening when the other issues come out.

But these periods of snoring do not especially disturb Mrs. Johns. It is at night, when slumber's chain has bound both her and her spouse, that her troubles begin. Then it is that Mr. Johns rouses himself to his greatest efforts in the snoring line, and sleep comes no more to the eyelids of his wife. It is no ordinary stertorous breathing, superinduced by some uncomfortable position, which Mr. Johns acquits himself of. It is not the puny effort of a man oppressed by too great an indulgence in untimely repasts and suffering from the visitation of a nightmare shod with Welsh rabbits; it is the deep rumble of the organ struggling with the diapason; it is the commingled noises of the limited express passing at full speed over the Eads bridge and a cyclone sweeping through the Ozarks; it is as if 10,000 Mississippi boats were whistling and snorting at once. It is something undescribably loud and shrill and deafening from which Mrs. Johns prays the court to relieve her without delay and forever.

This is the first case in which the snoring habit was made the ground for divorce proceedings and the outcome will be watched with interest. Countless men and women have had their sleep ruined and their lives made miserable by the snoring of their life companions, and if Mrs. Johns is granted her decree it is safe to predict that the divorce courts will be flooded with cases of a similar nature. How many men have courted and won gentle and dovelike creatures only, alas, to find out that when married they could not sleep in the same block unless they filled their ears with cotton. How many trusting women have found out that the god-like men who wooed and won them were, when asleep, the incarnation of pandemonium. Drink has broken up thousands of homes, but it isn't in the same class with the snoring habit for making a hell of married life.

There have been some great snorers. Suetonius tells of a Roman general who kept the whole camp awake and betrayed the presence of his troops to the enemy by his snoring. Norse mythology contains much about great snorers. There was Knud, a mighty snorer, whose prodigious efforts kept awake the whole northland and are the subject of one of the minor sagas. And there was Halfor Halforson, whose snores could be heard by the returning vikings far out at sea, not to mention Snorri Snorrison, himself a maker of sagas, who was no slouch at the art and science of snoring and whose name has been given to the habit.

Science has in vain searched for a remedy for snoring. Surgeons have performed operations which, so far from stopping the habit, have increased the capacity of snorers. Inventors have devised appliances which not only have not prevented the noise, but have rather added a shriller quality to it. The peculiarity about snorers is that no one has yet been found who admitted that he was guilty of the habit.

Some Lawmaking Bodies.

In these days of belligerent small things, when almost any little insular nation may bob up and declare war against some other little nation too small to draw a bead on, it is essential that the general reader should recognize whether or not such a declaration is a forgery. If that declaration hasn't the indorsement of the legislative body, it isn't loaded; but if the reader doesn't know the name of the legislative body, how is he to judge? Some of these lawmaking bodies which have the privilege of breaking a quorum and making pi out of the English type may be named as below:

The reichsrath, Austria; the orszaggyules, Hungary; the chung chi sh'u, China; the nei wu fu, Korea; the rigsdad, Denmark; bureau des affaires Tunisiennes, Tunis; bundesrath and reichstag, German empire; landtag, Baden; reichsrathe, Bavaria; burgerschaft, Bremen; staatsministerium, Brunswick; diet, Mecklenburg-Schwerin; herrenhaus and abgeordnetenhaus, Prussia; landstande, Wurttemberg; boule, Greece; senato and camera di deputati, Italy; imperial diet, Japan; states-gentral, Netherlands; volksraad, Orange Free State; cortes geraes, Portugal; narodna-skupshtina, Servia; senabodi, Siam; cortes constituyentes, Spain; storthing, Norway; standrath and nationlrath, Switzerland; ulema, Turkey.

In a good many of the lesser countries of the globe, of course, the chief ruler is the whole thing, and a good deal harder to pronounce—as, for instance, Shah Nasr-ed-Din of Persia, and Chulalongkorn I. of Siam.

A Clever Comparison.

The argument for the existence of God from the uniformity of nature is not a new one, but it is nowhere more cleverly put than in an anecdote of Galiani, related by L'Illustration Europeenne (Brussels, March 21). It says:

"To those who see in the existence of the world the effect of chance, a curious argument was opposed by Galiani. 'One day,' said he 'at Naples, a man took six dice in a dice-box and bet that he would throw six sixes. He succeeded at the first throw. I said to myself, 'Such a thing is possible.' He did it a second time; I said the same thing. He put the dice back into the box three, four, five times, and always threw six sixes. 'Sangue di Bacco!' I cried, 'the dice are loaded!' And so they were.

"Philosophers! when I consider the ever-renewed order of nature, her immutable laws, her revolutions, always constant in an infinite variety, this single chance of a world such as we see it, returning unceasingly notwithstanding a hundred million other chances of possible perturbation and destruction, I cry out: 'Of a truth, nature is loaded!'"—Translated for the Literary Digest.

In Everything Give Thanks.

A clerk and his country father entered a restaurant on Saturday evening and took seats at a table where sat a telegraph operator and a reporter. The old man bowed his head and was about to give thanks when a waiter flew up, saying:

"I have beefsteak, codfish balls, and bullheads."

Father and son gave their orders and the former again bowed his head. The young man turned the color of a blood-red beet, and touching his arm exclaimed in a low, nervous tone:

"Father, it isn't customary to do that in restaurants!"

"It's customary with me to return thanks to God wherever I am," said the old man.

For the third time he bowed his head, and the telegraph operator paused in the act of carving his beefsteak and bowed his head, and there wasn't a man who heard the short and simple prayer that didn't feel a profounder respect for the old father than if he had been the President of the United States.

The "Palmetto State."

The Charleston News and Courier thus explains the origin of South Carolina's sobriquet, "the Palmetto State:" "On June 28, 1776, a force of less than 100 Carolinians, under command of Moultrie, protected by the rude fortification on Sullivan's Island, in Charleston harbor, made of the trunks of the palmetto, repulsed the attacks of a British fleet under command of Sir Peter Parker, and when the State of South Carolina was organized, the State seal, which was first used in May, 1777, was made to commemorate this victory. A palm tree, growing erect on the seashore, represents the strength of the fort, while at its base an oak tree, torn from the ground and deprived of its branches, recalls the British fleet, built of oak timber, overcome by the palmetto."

Camph r for His Wife.

"There was a farmer up home," he said, "who used to have his occasional spree. Every one knew his failing, and neither of the druggists in town would sell him a drop. One day he brought a quart bottle into one of the apothecary shops, with two or three big lumps of gum camphor in the bottom. He told the druggist that his wife wanted her camphor bottle filled with alcohol. The druggist filled it without suspecting anything. In a week the old man came again, and in a little while the third time. Finally the druggist discovered that the 'gum camphor' was milky quartz, picked up in the fields, and that the farmer had poured camphor over the outside of the bottle until enough had crystallized there to look natural and smell right. The quartz didn't hurt the alcohol for drinking purposes."—Time and the Hour.

SLAPPED A SENATOR.

Duke of Tetuan Who Distinguished Himself in the Spanish Cortes.

The Duke of Tetuan, who recently distinguished himself by slapping the face of Senator Comas on the floor of the Spanish cortes, is an Irishman in blood. He is the son of General O'Donnell who in 1860, during the war with the Moors, invested and captured the town of Tetuan in Morocco and got a title for his bravery. The Duke has a title apart from that which he has inherited from his fighting father in Spain. It is that of Lord Donegal in Ireland. The name of the family is an illustrious one in Irish history, and when the present Duke's ancestors left their native land to espouse the cause of Spain they also left an estate that had been forcibly taken from them during the time of Elizabeth. Tetuan's father was a soldier par excellence, and a courtier too. The son has inherited all of his father's nobility, and to his Celtic wit he has added the dignity and the gravity of a Spanish don. The Duke is now 63 years old. He is widely known in Europe as a diplomat, and he is very proud of his Irish descent. The lineage, although not found in "Burke's Peerage," is a notable one. In the reign of James I. Niall Gary O'Donnell was Prince of Tyrconnell and Lord of the mountain country of Donegal. He fought against the English and served as a prisoner in the famous Tower of London. It was from a brother of this noted chieftain that the present Spanish Duke descended. One of the Duke's ancestors was a major in the Austrian army. Tetuan, although on his father's side an Irishman, belongs on his mother's side to the best Castilian families. Owing to his Irish ancestry he has refused the ambassadorship to England.

Funny Little Sprigs of Royalty.

The strangely dressed little tots whose pictures appear here are the children of the Princess Marie, of Roumania, and their garb is the national or Bayard costume. Prince Caral is 3 years old, and his little sister, Princess Elizabeth Charlotte Josephine Victoria Alexandria, is a year younger. It is hardly necessary to say they are great-grandchildren of Queen Victoria, and Prince Caral is the heir to the Roumanian crown.

Armed for Emergencies.

When Fridtjof Nansen was a young student he attended a ball and danced with many partners. Returning long after midnight through the streets of his lodgings, he heard loud outcries from a woman who was struggling with two ruffians. In another moment the woman broke away from them and ran toward the spot where Nansen was standing. The two men were close behind her in hot pursuit.

Nansen was an athlete full of courage and vigor, and put himself on guard as the men approached. He allowed the woman to pass, but called upon the infuriated pursuers to halt, standing directly in their way, and hitting out first at one and then at the other. The ruffians, angered by this unexpected attack, turned resentfully upon the rescuer, and would have overpowered him, and possibly have murdered him, if he had not shown presence of mind. Drawing himself up to his full height and throwing back his coat collar so as to expose the cotillion favors which he had worn during the ball, he sternly asked them if they knew who he was.

The two assailants, awed by his manner and supposing him to be a royal officer, were at once cowed. They apologized roughly for not recognizing him, dropped their arms, and sneaked off in the opposite direction from that which the woman had taken.

This incident of Nansen's youth illustrated at once the fearless courage and the readiness of resource which were to characterize his career as an intrepid explorer.

THE SUMMER VACATION.

A Change Even if in Minor Things Will Be a Great Benefit.

In the Ladies' Home Journal Edward W. Bok gives some sensible advice upon "Going Away in Summer." He points to the mistake that instead of a rest and change so many women and girls, physically tired and in need of recuperation, make of their vacations a round of continuous gayety, every moment crowded with some excitement or pleasure. In consequence, the woman who goes away for a rest comes back tired and worn out. Mr. Bok very truly says: "We all speak of 'going away' when we start on a vacation. But most of us do not 'go away.' 'Going away' means cutting ourselves entirely free from everything that has entered into our lives during the year—away from things which have occupied us, away from disturbing troubles, away from depressing surroundings, away from one's daily self to seek for one's best self, away from familiar places and people. Such a change means a change in ourselves, in our thoughts, in our ideas, in our motives, in our outlook on everything. The idea that we must ever keep ourselves busy, even in vacation, so that the mind may not become rusted, is all nonsense."

For those who cannot go away Mr. Bok advises a change in their mode of living, or in their daily work. "We need a change in our lives," he contends, "even if it is only a change of rooms; of merely not sleeping in the same rooms in summer as we do in winter, or even a rearrangement of the furniture, of the curtains, carpets or pictures in our room—any change. No woman is so humble of circumstances that she cannot make her life pleasanter and higher, bringing some change into it. A rest at home, with the mind refreshed by compassing minor changes from day to day, is oftimes as much needed and as beneficial as a long journey to other places or in other lands. One's limitations are often of immeasurable good as they show us how to get personal benefit in spite of them. 'Going away' in the summer need not always mean leaving the city or leaving one's home. It is, of course, better if we can do so. But we can stay at home and yet 'go away'—go away from things as we have had them for a twelve-month, and make them different."

Flying Machines.

The subject of aerial navigation is now so prominently before the public that reminiscences as to its beginning may not be out of order. The principle of the balloon was conceived by Albert of Saxony, as early as the fourteenth century, and successful balloons were made by a Portuguese Jesuit, Francesco Mendoza. The first balloon ascensions were made by the Montgolfiers in 1783, since which time balloon flights have become so common as to attract little attention. The idea that a piece of mechanism could be devised which should navigate the air, irrespective of the winds or currents, has long been entertained, and it is said that over 1,000 patents have been taken out in England and this country on flying machines. Most of them combine the balloon principle with a propelling power, the former for the purpose of sustaining the weight of the necessary machinery and of the operator. It is probably only a question of time when some of these devices will prove successful, and, according to common report, several inventors have already solved the problem. There must always, however, be a large element of danger in navigating the atmosphere and it is probable that even if flying machines become a success the most of the human race will be contented with terra firma modes of travel.

When Cain Killed Abel.

There is a very general misconception of a well-known passage in the Book of Genesis with regard to Cain's place of abode after he had killed his brother Abel. The expression reads: "Cain went out from the presence of the Lord and dwelt in the land of Nod," but learned commentators express the opinion that this should read, "land, Nod," the preposition being unnecessary. The word Nod is said to mean a wanderer, and, if Biblical students are to be trusted in this matter, the passage means Cain went out and dwelt in the land a wanderer or exile from his people, the presumption being that he was obliged to keep away from his immediate family for fear of their vengeance, an additional precaution for his safety being indicated by the fact that a mark was placed upon him. The question where Cain got his wife is a silly quibble which frequently comes up in Sunday schools and other places; silly from the fact that if the Biblical account of the origin of the human race from a single pair be received as correct, there may have been several thousand of human beings in the world long before the death of Cain.

Shaving by Machinery.

Shaving a man in twenty-five seconds is a feat deserving of the highest praise and reward by all such as value their time. The feat has been rendered easy of performance by the construction of a shaving machine of wood, reported to have been made by one Melchoir Farkas, a convict in the penitentiary of the city of Szegedin, Hungary. Farkas was put to labor in the cabinet-making shop of the prison, and, taking to his work with a will, he soon displayed great inventive ingenuity. With his machine he is said to have shaved all the inmates of the prison, nearly 150 in number, within less than an hour's time. The report fails to state, however, to what extent the shaving by machinery did or did not succeed in giving comfort to the sufferer in the chair.

THE WORLD'S HARVEST.

A dispatch from Budapest of August 20th gives the following figures in summing up the world's harvest by the Austrian Minister of Agriculture:

"The total yield of wheat is placed at 573,000,000 metric hundred weight, while the present annual requirements are estimated at 665,510,000 metric hundred weight. It is calculated that for 1897 and 1898 there will be a shortage of 50,800,000 hundred weight.

"The stocks remaining on hand from 1896 are approximately estimated at somewhere between 38,000,000 and 45,000,000. The total supply for the year, reckoning both the present stocks and the harvest, is estimated from 810,000,000 to 651,000,000 metric hundred weight.

"The world's deficits are estimated as follows: Rye, 67,000,000 hectoliters; barley, 38,000,000; oats, 58,000,000, and corn, 59,000,000. The reports state that many exporting countries, such as Turkey, Egypt Austria-Hungary and Australia will either be unable to export grain or will be compelled to import, while others, including British India, Argentine and Chili, will have their wheat export considerably reduced.

"The favored countries are the United States and Canada. The latter will soon be one of the most important of the exporting countries, its excess over last year's production being 70,000,000 bushels of wheat and 20,000,000 bushels of corn. Its output of all sorts of grain was 270,000,000 bushels. The yield of wheat in Great Britain this season is 50,000,000 bushels against 63,000,000 last year. The wheat area of British India is reduced from 23,000,000 acres to 18,000,000, and the wheat yield from 234,000,000 to 202,000,000 bushels.

"The United States, which has reduced its area sown in oats by 2,000,000 acres; that sown in corn by 1,000,000 acres, while that in other grains nearly unchanged, will nevertheless dispose of 534,000,000 bushels of wheat against 434,000,000 bushels last year, allowing the transportation of 160,000,000 bushels of wheat, while the exports of corn will possibly be 50,000,000 greater than those of last year.

"The prospects for oats and barley are less favorable than in 1896. The price of bread in Austria has already risen 30 per cent."

A Fresno press dispatch of Sept. 1 says: Constable Ben Dennis is down from the mountains and states that the outlaw Cliff Regan and his gang had been seen at various places by a number of persons during the past two weeks. The officer is daily expecting the desperadoes to commit some depredation, and he advises miners who have made clean-ups to use the greatest caution in bringing their wealth down to the valley. It would not be surprising to hear of the gang holding up a stage any day. The fact is that the Constable shares the uneasiness felt by the residents of the mountains and the owners of the stage lines because of the presence of the outlaws. He is making dilligent inquiries to keep track of the whereabouts of the gang, but he is having a difficult time, because the criminals are roaming the hills and appear at places many miles apart. The officer is convinced, however, that they have a camp from which they make their reconnoitering expeditions. Regan was raised in the foothills of this county, and he knows the mountains thoroughly. He cannot understand why the outlaws have shown themselves in this county if they have any intention of committing a crime on this side of the San Joaquin river, unless it should be the reckless daring of the men. He thinks it possible they have some scheme on foot over in Madera county and have come across the river to distract attention in that quarter, with the purpose of making a sudden ride over there and running off a bunch of cattle or committing some other depredation. As far as can be learned Regan has two half-breed Indians and a white man in his gang. Constable Dennis believes the white man is Jake Moss, a notorious cattle thief who has operated in the mountains of Madera, Fresno and Tulare counties for a number of years. The whole gang called at a house on Pine Ridge about a week ago and was given breakfast there. It appears at the present time there is no warrant out for Regan's arrest. While he has stolen many bands of cattle and horses in the mountains, the people are so afraid of him and his gang that they dare not swear to complaints against them. The outlaws have terrorized the people and carry on their depredations without fear of molestation.

The mining excitement on Coffee creek, which has the rich strike of the Graves brothers as a basis and is being worked by the newspapers for all it is worth, is certainly revenue producing for our merchants and transportation companies, as well as for all those located on the line of travel and who have something to sell. WESTERN RANGE HORSES.

"No horses in the world excel the range horses of our Western States for military purposes, and I think the trip just finished by my cowboy friends here proves my assertion."

The foregoing remark was made by Dr. William A. Bruett, special commissioner of the bureau of animal industry of the Department of Agriculture. He was at his home in Chicago and with him were two stalwart, sunbrowned young men, William and Bert Gabriel.

"These young men," continued Mr. Bruett, "have just demonstrated that the bronchos and range horses of our plains can cover a distance of 2400 miles in ninety days and subsist on grass and water along the route, without grain, and more important still from a milltary point of view, without being shod.

"I can say without fear of contradiction that no other horses in the world could have made the trip under those circumstances.

"The route, beginning at Sheridan, Wyoming, and ending at Galena, this State, covered all kinds of country, turf, sand, rock, clay and mud. When they entered upon the last 100 miles of the trip the horses were in as good condition in every way as when they started from Wyoming, but from Dubuque to Waterloo, Iowa, the road along the Mississippi river was either over jagged rocks or through deep mud. The heels and frogs of the horses' feet were so badly bruised that, although they could have completed the distance to Chicago, I telegraphed the men to let the noble little animals stop at Galena. Had the horses been shod at Sioux City, Iowa, as I telegraphed, knowing the roads over which they would have to travel to Chicago, the horses would have reached here in first-class condition Saturday. The telegram failed to reach the men, and they brought the horses through under my original instructions."

"What were the instructions?"

"To begin with, the Department of Agriculture some time ago determined to create, if possible, a foreign demand for our native Western horses. To do this it was first necessary to prove the merit of these horses, particularly for cavalry and military use, as nearly all foreign countries are buying large numbers of horses for military purposes. It was urged against the native American horses that they were lacking in size and endurance for that work. To answer that objection it was decided to have horses of the two types known as bronchos and rangers make a trip in company from Wyoming Territory to Chicago, a distance of 2500 miles. To ride these horses we happened to have just the men in the local bureau at the stock yards of the Degartment of Agriculture, two brothers, named William and Albert Gabriel. They had been cowboys for yaars and were thoroughly familiar with the entire Western country. They were willing to accept the task, fully realizing its hardships, and on June 5th they started for Chicago. Their instructions from the Department of Agriculture were to proceed to Sheridan, Wyoming, select from a ranch two horses which had never been bridled or saddled, and bring them to Chicago without feeding them any grain so long as it was possible for the horses to find grazing, making the trip as quickly as possible without injuring the horses."

"Are you satisfied with the test of the horses?" Dr. Bruett was asked.

"Not entirely, because I wanted them to finish at Chicogo," he replied.

"But that is my only regret. As a test of the endurance of the Western range horse, I am sure the Department will be more that satisfied with the result, as it demonstrates that the animal is all that has been claimed. As I said before, no other horses in the world could have made such a trip under such conditions. I believe it will change the opinion of foreign governments, who have felt that our range horses were too light for military purposes. I intend to take some of the buyers of horses for export down to Galena and let them see the horses just as they are after their unequalled journey.

"It is a fact not known, as I said before, that the range horse has in his veins the blood of thoroughbred and the standard bred Percherons, Clydesdales, Hambletonians and other famous strains. Stallions of these classes have been sent to the ranches, and the result is an increase in the size and quality of the horse. The range horses, as they are called in distinction from bronchos, range in weight from 950 to 1150 pounds. The bronchos, which are of Spanish origin and have no improved blood in them, weigh from 750 to 950 pounds. The trip just made, however, shows the broncho is equal in endurance to the larger horse and is a wonderful weight carrier, but is not as pretty as the range horse. The demand abroad for our Western horses is growing and I believe it will rapidly increase.

"One of the most important features possessed by the range horse is small, hard hoofs, which will stand the wear of paved streets or rough country. The range horse is more intelligent, ambitious, tractable and enduring than those grown by breeders and farmers in the Middle and Eastern States. In 1893 only 500 horses were sold in Chicago for export. This year the number will exceed 15,000, or 3 per cent of the total number disposed of in this market. The French army has taken a great many. We believe the performance of the two horses which just came from Wyoming will influence the German and English army agents and exporters for domestic purposes to try our Western horses."

COURIERS OF THE AIR.

It pleases us to know that the Miner-Index reaches out beyond its immediate environment and conveys information afar. Some weeks ago this paper stated that Mr. J. G. Thompson, the well known Mono Lake scientist, had made various experiments with the common sea-gull, with a view of ascertaining if it possessed the homing instinct of the pigeon. Since then he has abundantly demonstrated that the gull as a messenger bird is greatly superior to any of the feathered tribe outside of its own species, being stronger, swifter, and a night-flyer, which the pigeon is not, and possessing vastly more endurance. It is its nature and habit to be in almost constant motion, seldom resting longer than two or three minutes at a time. Its homing instinct is strong. It will return unerringly to the very spot where it was hatched, distinguishing its own nest from hundreds of others close at hand. When domesticated they become very tame and freely mix with barnyard fowls. They will not permit strangers to approach them, but suffer themselves to be handled with impunity by any one with whom they are familiar. If they can be practically employed as messengers, it will not be long before the carrier pigeon will be considered nothing but an ordinary bird. The latter in its flight can carry but a very small parcel—just a little bit of a thing, while the gull can easily push 50 miles an hour behind him and carry a properly arranged package weighing half a pound or more. And another thing about the gull, which the pigeon is not capable of: when weary it can alight any whereon the water and take a rest, so that it may be taken a thousand miles to sea and still have a chance to get home and deliver its message. We are gratified to observe that parties high in the scientific world have taken cognizance of the experiments made by Mr. Thompson, to whom is due the credit of discovering the valuable qualities of the bird that has hitherto been considered a nuisance. He has received several letters of inquiry, one from Prof. T. S. Palmer, Acting Chief of the U. S. Biological Survey at Washington, a portion of which is subjoined:

"I have seen the Bodie Miner-Index containing an account of some experiments said to have been made by you in utilizing gulls instead of carrier pigeons for transporting messages. According to this article two gulls liberated 60 miles south of Mono Lake reached your ranch in a little more than an hour; a second pair traversed the distance from Independence to Mono Lake in less than two hours, while a third pair liberated in San Francisco arrived home in four hours and a half.

"If these statements are correct they are of great interest, not only in showing the possibility of using tame gulls for carrier pigeons, but also throwing some light on the speed at which these birds can travel.

"I should be greatly obliged if you would inform me whether your experiments are correctly reported by the Index and whether you have made any other tests besides the three mentioned above."
—Bodie Miner-Index.

In commenting upon the general revival of trade throughout the country the Sacramento News insists that the activity in wool, cotton, rubber, iron and steel manufacturing is due to the advance in the price of wheat and other agricultural staples and not in any sense to the tariff. "The mills open only when the farmer prospers," says our contemporary. "The Chronicle would have us infer, we believe, that the farmers are prospering because the mills are opening, whereas the truth is that the mills are opening because the farmers are prospering." But there are several fatal defects in the theory so dogmatically laid down. One is that the wool, cotton, rubber, iron and steel mills and factories in this country began to open and prices to rise as soon as it became known that the Dingley tariff would be enacted and before wheat had commenced to boom or the market for other products expand. Another defect is that England, Germany, France and Italy by agreement that the tariff must close the mills with which they have been supplying the American market, signify in the plainest possible terms that this market has thus been turned over to the American manutacturers. To ask the foreigner what set American wheels in motion is to get but one reply—the Dingley bill. It stands to reason that he is right. We have no desire to underrate the great help which the times are having from the advance in the price of wheat and other staples, but it is folly to attribute to that the results which are visibly due to the cutting off of the foreign supply of manufactured goods by process of law. The entire sum that wheat will bring into the country is no larger than the amount of increase of bank clearings, incident to the reappearance of hoarded millions, which immediately followed the enactment of the tariff and the restoration of confidence. Allowing wheat half a billion of dollars leaves the McKinley programme already credited with as much more of released and employed capital. All this helps the farmer directly in that it makes a home demand for his products for which the foreigner is not permitted to compete on even terms. To open an iron and steel mill employing 3000 hands is to give 3000 men, representing 15,000 hungry mouths, the money to buy generously of the farmer's products, where before they had bought most sparingly or not at all. Even if wheat had never gone any higher than it was when the industrial revival began, the farmer would still have been well off.

Gregory; Winnemucca, M. G. Hamm. Mr. Nicholas says: "From the above you will see that Independence has one year more to redeem herself. If Independence does not do better next year than it has been doing for pastoral support, Independence people will find themselve without a resident minister. There are many other places open where a minister would be appreciated and supported, but the Missionary Society cannot send men to those places as long as they have to help such places as Independence."

Messrs. Newman and Manuel came in Wednesday from Mazourka Canyon, where they spent about ten days examining the country with a view to commencing work on a large placer mining operation. Mr. Manuel is an expert placer miner and he states that he is favorably impressed with the proposition. He will start for Los Angeles this evening for the purpose of submitting his report to the company.

There were two legal holidays this week—Monday, September 6th, Labor Day, and Thursday, September 9th, Admission Day—as observed by our county officials. By an amendment to the Code in February last, the first Monday in October, which had been observed as Labor Day, will no longer be a holiday.

Mrs. Heenan McCarroll and her daughter, Miss Birdie Goodale, are in town. Mrs. McCarroll is undergoing treatment for a severe case of blood-poisoning, caused by a barb-wire prick on the finger. It was feared that the arm was in danger, but at last report Dr. Woodin hoped to effect a cure.

The Montgomery mill, at Pleasant Canyon, will resume crushing on the 15th inst., on company ore and that of the chloriders, among whom are A. J. Davis, Frank Sorba, Manuel Aguirre and others. J. E. Langford has resigned the superintendency to "Monte" Montgomery.

The copper production in July, 1897, according to the statement of John Stanton, who acts as statistician for the companies, showed a sharp and unexpected decrease in activity. The total output reported from the mines in the United States for the month was 15,334 long tons, which was less than that for July, 1896, by 1251 tons, or 7.5 per cent; it was also less by 1931 tons, or 11.2 per cent, than the monthly average for the first six months of the year. Notwithstanding this reduction in July, the output of copper in the United States for the seven months ending with July still shows a large increase over that of any previous year; the gain was 16,020 tons, or 14.8 per cent, as compared with the corresponding period in 1896, and 30,659 tons, or 32.9 per cent, over 1895. The United States exports still continue to be on a large scale, and Europe took from us during the seven months no less than 78,238 tons of copper, or 63.1 per cent of our entire production. The exports show the considerable increase of 9036 tons over last year, but this was less than the gain in production by 6084 tons; that is, our home supplies were greater by that quantity, nearly all of which seems to have gone into consumption, as very little increase of stocks is heard of. At present there is reported an increase in manufacturing, which would cause a larger demand for copper here. Parties in a position to know confirm the reports of heavy sales of copper for exports to France. It appears that representatives of the French government and other foreign consumers recently asked the Calumet and Hecla Mining Company for a price on 30,000,000 pounds, or 20,000 tons. The Calumet people named 11⅜ cents as their lowest figure. Thereupon the Frenchmen bid 11¼ cents, which offer was promptly refused. After waiting a number of days the Calumet's term was finally accepted. The sale is said to mean 11½ cents for ingot copper right away.

The movement for a uniform divorce law, to be adopted in all the States, is being pushed systematically, though quietly, and is gaining headway. A committee of the uniform law committee is now at work drafting a bill on the lines of the divorce law now in force in the District of Columbia. When completed the bill will be submitted to the National Bar Association, and, if approved by that body, an effort will be made to have it adopted by the Legislatures of all the States, thus ending the scandal, misery and actual crime now caused by the conflicting provisions of the various laws on this important subject. Such a work is greatly needed, and it is hoped its importance will appeal to all the Legislatures for its speedy accomplishment.

It Saves the Croupy Children.

SEAVIEW, Va.—We have a splendid sale on Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, and our customers coming from far and near speak of it in the highest terms. Many have said that their children would have died of croup if Chamberlain's Cough Remedy had not been given.—KELLAM & OURREN. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

MINING CASE DECIDED.

This morning Judge Lamar rendered his decision in the mining suit of L. Lasky, Plaintiff, vs. Ruperto Carrasce, D. Holland, Jesus Montano, Jesus Molino and Ramon Salazar, Defendants. The action was dismissed as to defendant Salazar, for the reason that he is a minor.

The plaintiff recovers judgment against the remaining four defendants for $50 damages, costs of suit, probably amounting to $500, and a decree perpetually enjoining them from entering upon the Key Not mine. The Judge ordered the plaintiffs attorneys to prepare findings.

The trial of this suit lasted five weeks, being the longest trial of record in this county. P. H. Mack, Esq., end P. W. Forbes, Esq., were the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendants were represented by F. E. Densmore, Esq., and Richard S. Miner, Esq.

RUSSIAN HUNTING DOGS.

The Laikas Furnish Food, Draw Sledges and Supply Clothing to Their Owners.

Harding Cox writes about laikas, or the northern dogs, to the London Field.

"The duties of the true laika," he says, "are of an extremely varied nature. Among the Chinese about 1,000,000 are eaten every year, while in Russia the beast is trained for all sorts of hunting—squirrels, bear, deer, snipe, capercailzie, ermine, sable, and all the other beasts are taken with them, even the wolves. It is estimated that nearly 1,000,000 rubles' worth of game is taken every year with the aid of the laikas in Russia. Prince Schirinsky, a Russian noble, is trying to get a cross between the laika and some setter or retriever, believing that he would thereby obtain a dog which would make as nearly a perfect hunting dog as is possible.

"In the polar swamps the laikas are used in drawing sledges, as well as hunting, by the natives, while their warm pelts are made to serve as coats and trousers.

"The laika has an upright, pointed ear, which the dog pricks when excited. The muzzle is long and sharp, but powerful, set to a broad forehead. The body is strong and at the quarters broad and powerful. The ribs are big and long. The chest is deep and broad. The legs are for running, while the coat is thick, having 'cotton' under the hair, which makes it warm.

"The chief colors are from black and black and tan to grayish, but the dogs are never spotted in the pure blood. A few of these dogs can stop a bear or anything else easily. The dogs are just short of two feet higher."

The Real Estate Man's Pet Story.

Opdike (discussing their new flat)—The real estate agent said that my wife and I could have the flat for $25 a month, but that he would charge any one else $30.

Fathergill—That was the offer he made me and my wife when we thought of taking it.—Brooklyn Eagle.

USE GENTLENESS.

Be gentle in stimulating the kidneys, otherwise you will excite and weaken them. The happiest results follow the use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters to overcome renal inactivity. Avoid the unmedicated, fiery stimulants of commerce. The kidneys have a delicate membrane easily irritated, and upon this the action of such excitants is pernicious. Malarial complaints, indigestion, rheumatism, neuralgia and biliousness succumb to the corrective influence of the Bitters.

Nurse—Johnnie, the stork has just brought you a little baby. Wouldn't you like to see a little brother? Johnnie—Naw. But I'd like to see the stork.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MOTHERS.

We are asserting in the courts our right to the exclusive use of the word "CASTORIA," and "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," as our Trade Mark.

I, Dr. Samuel Pitcher, of Hyannis, Massachusetts, was the originator of "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," the same that has borne and does now bear the fac simile signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on every wrapper. This is the original "PITCHER'S CASTORIA" which has been used in the homes of the mothers of America for over thirty years. Look Carefully at the wrapper and see that it is the kind you have always bought, and has the signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on the wrapper. No one has authority from me to use my name except The Centaur Company of which Chas. H. Fletcher is President.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. E. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

WISE WOMEN.

Those Who Heed the First Symptoms of Nervous Derangement.

A dull, aching pain at the lower part of the back, and a sensation of little rills of heat, or chills running down the spine, are symptoms of general womb derangement.

If these symptoms are not accompanied by leucorrhœa, they are precursors of that weakness. It is worse than folly to neglect these symptoms. As a friend, a woman friend, let me advise the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Mrs. George W. Shepard, Watervliet, N. Y., says: "I am glad to state that I am cured from the worst form of female weakness. Before using Mrs. Pinkham's Remedies it seemed that I had no strength at all. I was in pain all over. I began to feel better after taking the first dose of Vegetable Compound. I have used five bottles, and I feel like a new woman. I know if other suffering women would only try it, it would help them."

Wood-Stone.

From a mixture of magnesia and sawdust, subjected to a high temperature and great pressure, Dr. Otto Lehnig has produced a substance which he calls "xyolith," or "wood-stone." It can be cut with tools, but, it is said, does not burn, and does not absorb moisture. The inventor thinks it should prove useful as a building material.

Swift-Flying Clouds.

Mr. Clayton, of the Blue Hill Observatory, near Boston, reports that observations made there show that the average speed with which clouds, between 8,000 and 9,000 feet high, move is sixty miles an hour in midsummer, and one hundred and ten miles an hour in midwinter. The swiftest flight of a cloud yet measured was 230 miles an hour.

A Pigeon Race.

In France pigeons are regarded as valuable messengers in case of war, and recently the French Minister of War offered a prize for the winner of a pigeon race from Perigueux to Paris, 260 miles. No less than 2,746 birds were entered in the contest. The winner made the distance in seven hours thirty-four minutes, an average of over thirty-four miles an hour.

Ice-Breaking Ships.

Vice Admiral Makarow, of the Russian navy, has been studying the construction and use of powerful ice-breaking ships. At a recent meeting of the Imperial Geographical Society at St. Petersburg, he expressed his belief that with two such ships, each of ten thousand horse-power, acting together, a line of free water communication could be kept open in winter to the port of St. Petersburg, and he added that they could even force their way through the glacial ocean if the thickness of the ice did not exceed twelve feet.

The Flight of the Sun.

Astronomers know that the sun, accompanied by the earth and the other planets, is moving toward a point in the northern heavens with great speed. Just what the velocity is, however, cannot yet be told with certainty. Prof. Simon Newcomb, in a recent lecture, said that it was probably between five miles and nine miles per second. The bright star Alpha Lyrae lies not far from the point toward which the sun is moving. Every moment we are getting nearer to the place where that star now is. "When shall we get there? Probably in less than a million years; perhaps in half a million."

A Short-Lived Island.

In 1867 a new shoal was discovered in the group of the Tonga, or Friendly Islands. In 1877 smoke was seen over the shoal. In 1885 the shoal had become a volcanic island, more than two miles long and 240 feet high, and a fierce eruption was taking place within it. In 1886 the island had begun to shrink in dimensions, although the next year its highest point was 325 feet above sea level. In 1889 its height had diminished one-half, and the ocean close around it was more than a mile deep. In 1892 the island rose only about twenty six feet above sea level. According to the latest information, its complete disappearance, under the action of the waves, will not be long delayed.

High-Priced Bumblebees.

Many years ago the farmers of Australia imported bumblebees from England and set them free in their clover fields. Before the arrival of the bees clover did not flourish in Australia, but after their coming the farmers had no more difficulty on that score. Mr. Darwin had shown that bumblebees were the only insects fond of clover nectar which possessed a proboscis sufficiently long to reach the bottom of the long, tube-like flowers, and, at the same time, a body heavy enough to bend down the clover-head so that the pollen would fall on the insect's back, and thus be carried off to fertilize other flowers of the same species. According to a writer in Popular Science News, the bumblebees sent to Australia cost the farmers there about half a dollar a piece, but they proved to be worth the price.

A Sparrow Prima Donna.

Monsieur Mingaud, a naturalist of Nimes, France, gives, in La Revue Scientifique, an interesting account of the musical accomplishments of a sparrow in his collection of living birds. He captured the sparrow soon after it had been hatched, and fed it by hand until it could care for itself. Then he placed it in a cage containing a chaffinch, a gold finch and two canaries. After a time the sparrow learned to warble like the finches and to trill like the canaries, the imitations being so perfect as to deceive the ear. In spring Monsieur Mingaud is accustomed to keep a box of crickets near his bird-cages. Two days after the crickets had been placed near the cage containing the sparrow the latter began to imitate their cry, intermingling it with its songs. Even after the crickets had long been dead the sparrow remembered its lesson, and continued to repeat their cry. None of the other birds attempted to imitate the crickets. Singularly enough, the sparrow never utters the peculiar squalling cry of its own species, having been removed from its nest too early, apparently, to have learned it.

Cause and Effect.

"Never tell your dreams" is an oft-repeated bit of advice, yet it is probable that few persons do things in their dreams that are more foolish than some things they do when they are wide-awake.

"I had a very singular dream last night," said a boarder, as he came down to breakfast one morning. "I dreamed I was a spectator at one of those peculiar institutions known as 'cake-walks.' I was the only white man present, and was enjoying the novel sensation of watching for the first time a procession of gorgeously arrayed coupels making the circuit of a large room in the most stately and imposing style imaginable, when suddenly the master of ceremonies saw me, took me by the arm, led me to the center of the hall, called a halt, and the entire assembly gathered about me, and began to jabber in an unknown language.

"All at once I began to grow tall. I felt myself rapidly expanding in an upward direction. The crowd at my feet seemed to dwindle. My head pushed its way up through the ceiling, then through the roof, and probably it would have bumped against the moon in another minute if I hadn't waked up. It was a narrow escape."

"And you saw and did all this at a cake-walk, did you?" asked one of the regular boarders.

"Yes, that's what I said."

"H'mph! What have you eaten for supper?"

"Nothing but a plate of buckwheat cakes."

"That explains it. What you saw in your dream was a buckwheat cake-walk."

KANSAS TWISTERS.

A Few Little Anecdotes Told by a Truthful Witness.

"I've heard so many incredible stories about the cyclone and its eccentricities," said the solemn looking man to a party of tourists he had joined in the sleeping car, "that I've been to Kansas making some personal investigations in the interest of science.

"I find that many reports from that section have been grossly exaggerated. Nothing occurs there that is not in accord with our understanding of these terrific outbursts of nature. For instance, the tornado, often mistaken for the cyclone, has a rotary motion. I have known it to dip low enough to bore a well and then bound once more to the region of the clouds. This wonderful phenomenon was an accomplished fact in far less time than it takes me to tell of it.

"An extensive farmer here heard the roar of an approaching storm and just had time to get his team from his reaper to a place of safety. The wind caught the reaper and sent it round and round and round the immense tract, till the grain was all cut."

"But didn't it blow away?"

"Not at all. That would have destroyed our theory. The circular whirl of the irresistible power swept the grain to the center of the field and into an immense stack such as human hands could not have piled.

"One of the strangest and best authenticated incidents I learned of occurred where a cyclone struck the base of a mountain and went burrowing through it. A few feet in the twister encountered a solid granite formation. It was two weeks later when the tunnel was completed and the terrific wind resumed its devastating way on the other side. The tunnel was promptly appropriated by a railroad company."

"I had rather an unpleasant experience in that section," said one of the tourists. "I bought a little farm there, just to be a landholder. Everything in three counties was plastered thick with mortgages. A cyclone wound them all up into one great package and pasted them down on my little place. We drilled and blasted to get them off, but it was no go. My farm is mortgaged $40,000,000 deep."

The solemn man of science never turned a hair, but took notes.—Detroit Free Press.

A Base-Ball Duel.

The story is told by students in the German university city of Leipsic of a strange duel which once occurred there between an American and a young German student. The American was a graduate of Yale. He had a squabble with a law student and a challenge resulted. The Yale man knew nothing about weapons of the ordinary kind, but he had pitched in the Yale base-ball nine. So, to get his fun out of the affair, he named base-balls as the weapons—base-balls at ten paces. The German had never heard of a base-ball and none could be got in Leipsic to illustrate to him their deadly qualities. Eventually the Yale man said ordinary hard wood base-balls, three inches in diameter, would do him. Both principals accordingly were supplied with hard wood balls, and at 5 in the morning the procession moved out to the Rosenthal with surgeons, seconds and friendly advisers. The rest of the story is brief and painful. At the first exchange the Yale man sent an incurve into the native's jaw, just to the left of the mouth, and broke it. The native's second declared that honor had been satisfied and the procession moved back to the town for breakfast—all except the victim of the incurve, who was taken to a private clinic to be repaired.

Make Your Own Cook Book.

A most valuable cook book, which no printed volume can ever supersede, is the individual work of its owner. It is composed of recipes, tested and true, collected from various places, and containing directions which the owner understands and rules that suit her individual taste. This cook book may be written on tinted and glazed writing paper, leaving wide margins at the sides. It is a good plan to arrange it in sections, allowing one section for soups, one for fish and crustacea, one for meats and fowls, one for game and one for salads and desserts. A section might also be added for preserves, candies and valuable miscellaneous recipes, and the whole should be indexed in another final section. It will be found most convenient to have each of these sections in individual covers, as one can then be used without wear upon the others. These covers may be made of white oilcloth, celluloid or some glazed material, and may be decorated if the owner pleases.

His Choice.

It is said that Charles Wesley was sometimes easily annoyed, and on one occasion, at a conference, he became so irritated at the prolix remarks of a speaker that he said to his brother:

"Stop that man's speaking. Let us attend to business."

But the offender was relating his religious experience, and though it was at so great a length, John Wesley evidently thought that no one had a right to interfere with it. He was therefore allowed to continue, but the moment came when Charles could contain himself no longer.

"Unless he stops," he whispered to John, "I'll leave the conference."

By this time John was enjoying the man's simple story, and he only turned and whispered to some one sitting near:

"Reach Charles his hat!"

PHOTOGRAPHING A SHOT.

Wonderful Experiments In Determining the Time of a Flash of Electricity.

Recent achievements in the moving photography that has produced the animatograph, biograph, cinematograph and other representations of motion are not more wonderful than the lately perfected photography of the flying bullet. Professor C. Vernon Boys, F. R. S., has worked on this seemingly unsolvable problem with great success, as have also two Italian artillery officers.

In the course of a lecture on the subject, Mr. Boys demonstrated that the ordinary notion that an electric spark is instantaneous was quite erroneous and stated that the light of the two ends of the ordinary electric spark lasted a little less than the one-hundred thousandth part of a second. It was, of course, instantaneous to our senses, but to tests which could measure accurately to the one-hundred millionth part of a second the electric spark was anything but instantaneous. This spark was no good for taking the photograph of a flying bullet, as the lecturer showed by exhibiting one of his attempts, which made quite a blurred picture.

Mr. Boys then proceeded to explain the steps which he took in order to reduce the length of time of the electric spark. To this end it was essential that the terminals should be made of copper, platinum or some metal which did not produce readily an ignitible vapor, and the electric current must not be driven through wires at all. He used a very thick, broad band of copper, not more than two inches long, which reached around the edge of the plate, so that the electric current had not more than three or four inches to go altogether. He explained by diagrams how he had effected his object and shortened the time of the spark to about one-thirteen millionth of a second, or about 100 times quicker than the ordinary flash.

To give the audience some idea of the infinitesimal fraction of time, he said the time occupied by the spark as reduced by his apparatus was proportionately as much less than a second as a second was less than five months, and during that time a bullet fired from a magazine rifle could not travel more than one five hundredth part of an inch. By this simple contrivance he was able to get a brighter and shorter spark and all that was necessary to make a good and sharp picture.—New York World.

A TONGUE OF FLAME.

"Peace, peace," smiled the rose in her garden,
And "peace" sang the bird on his tree,
But a bale-smoke shadowed the valleys
Where the rivers run to the sea,
And the smell of battle was on the winds
Of the summer of 'Sixty-three.

In the lap of its mother mountain
Virginia City lay,
And, wet in a rolling rain-cloud
Of glimmering gold-and-gray,
Behind the Sierras slowly sank
The sun of Liberty Day.

The mammoth flag on the summit
In the tremulous rainbow glow
Fluttered far like a scarlet ribbon
To the eyes that watched below,
But flashed in the sky of a nation
The glory of long ago.

Then a frown on the cheek of the twilight
Where the smile of the west was warm!
And climbing in dusky billows
Mount Davidson's awful form
A wonder of darkness swept the height
Like the rush of a silent storm!

Thro' the murk of the muffled city
With its mystery untold,
While the people dizzily gazing
Stood dumb in the streets, behold
In the blackening west o'er the mountain's crest
A twinkle of fiery gold!

Every eye caught the heaven-hung vision,
Every heart felt its wizard spell.
It flared like a spirit candle,
It streamed like a star that fell,
It waved command like a signal hand,
It swung like a voiceless bell.

Did they hear it? White faces listened;
Wild thoughts guessed its meaning divine.
"There is news of the war from the eastward;
The palm-tree has bowed to the pine—
And the Lord of Hosts is uplifting
His torch on the hills for a sign!"

'Twas a dream, but not all. On the shadow
The light that quivered and curled
Was the flag by patriot fingers
That birthday morning unfurled,
And it blazed in the unseen sunset
Like a beam from another world,

Alone in its daylight glory
Above where the lightnings run—
But the glad city read on the morrow
Its token of deeds that were done,
And the steeples sang, "Vicksburg is taken,
And Gettysburg's field is won!"
—Theron Brown, in Youth's Companion.

MAN'S MISSION.

It was generally acknowledged by those who knew them that Jack Newlyn and his pretty wife had solved the much-discussed problem of how to be happy though married. True, they had only been united six months, and perhaps it was a little premature to speak definitely on the subject, but to all appearances it did not seem possible that the sunshine of their lives could ever be darkened by a cloud. Their affection for each other disgusted the cynical and delighted the romantic.

It was as ardent and enduring now as it had been the day they were made man and wife, and their intimate friends were wont to declare that existence for them was one long, continual honeymoon.

Old philosophers, however, shook their heads and said it was not to be expected that such a state of unalloyed bliss could continue forever, and these philosophers were right. One day a hawk swooped down on the Newlyn dovecote and put an end to the billing and cooing.

It was in this way: Jack Newlyn, who was a barrister of some repute, left his home in St. John's Wood one fine morning, leaving his little wife in her usual state of happiness, returning a few minutes after 5 to find her almost as solemn as the great judge in whose presence he had been propounding the intricacies of an entangled will suit all the afternoon.

"Anything wrong, dearest?" he inquired as they sat down to dinner.

Mrs. Newlyn gave a start.

"O, no," she murmured, "only—only I have had a visit from Miss Blake this afternoon."

"Who's Miss Blake?" the embryo Q. C. asked carelessly.

"O, you must have heard of her, Jack; she's the President of the 'Modern Woman's Pioneer Rescue League.'"

Mr. Newlyn gasped.

"And—and what did she want, a subscription?"

"N—o, I'll tell you. I don't think I ever mentioned it, but before I met you I was a 'Pioneer.' Now, one of the rules of the society orders that when a member becomes engaged or married she forfeits her place; in fact, she is compelled to resign."

Mr. Newlyn muttered something about a "good job."

"Well, it seems," his wife went on, "that quite a lot of the members have left lately owing to this cause. There's Lucy Johnson, she's engaged to Mr. Stone, and last week Kate Brown was married, and now there are several more on the point of leaving."

"Quite an epidemic," the barrister remarked, irreverently.

"So," his wife continued with a slight frown, "Miss Blake fears that soon she will be the only one who has remained true to the ship."

"Why doesn't she get spliced?" Jack asked, "and then the ship would sink."

"She has no desire to get 'spliced,' as you call it. She is a woman of firm principles, and she has devoted her life to doing good. But to return to what I was saying. As the society had suffered such losses she has decided to strike out the rule which declares engaged girls and married women ineligible, and she is now going round to all the old members asking them to rejoin."

The young husband's face bore a look of the liveliest consternation.

"And," his wife resumed, "I have promised to do so."

Mr. Newlyn's consternation deepened to direst dismay.

"But—but what does she want you to do?" he asked. "And what are the 'Pioneers'?"

"They are a little band of women who are engaged in the noble work of rescuing their unhappy fellow-creatures from sin and wickedness."

"But what are they required to do? Not—not to dive into filthy dens in the East End, visiting housebreakers?"

"N—o, not exactly that. We hold meetings for cabdrivers, sandwichmen, and matchboys. Social evenings they are, with light refreshment, such as coffee and buns——"

"C-o-f-f-e-e a-n-d b-u-n-s," Mr. Newlyn murmured blankly.

"Yes, and a little music, and we take them aside and talk seriously to them and try to bring them to a better frame of mind. It is a noble work, Jack. Miss Blake says it is wicked for us to lead a life of luxury and ease when there are thousands going to perdition. She says it is woman's mission to reform man."

"Quite so," the young barrister responded readily, "and you are fulfilling that mission admirably."

"I——"

"Yes, you are reforming me.'"

"O, you don't need reforming, dear."

"And cabdrivers and sandwichmen do?"

"Yes, indeed."

"But, my dear, evening is the only time that I have you to myself."

"I know," and she sighed. "It is awkward, but quite unavoidable."

"And I am to mope at home by myself while you are talking seriously to cabmen and matchboys?"

"Now, darling, you mustn't be selfish."

"Selfish?"

"Yes, you must learn to give up something for your unfortunate fellowmen."

"Well, what with subscribing to orphanages and homes for destitute children, I give up close on a hundred a year as it is."

"Yes, but that is no proper sacrifice," his little wife said, quickly. "You are rich, and a hundred pounds doesn't mean any real giving up on your part. You don't deprive yourself of any pleasure, you know." Mr. Newlyn knitted his brow. His wife's logic was unanswerable.

"And if you spared me for three or four evenings a week you would be doing so, and you would know that your dear little wife was perhaps persuading some poor sinner to lead a better life."

"And what am I to do with myself while you are persuading?"

"Well, you can read and smoke, or go and see your old bachelor friends occasionally."

"And so those delightful evenings when you used to play and sing to me are at an end?"

"I'm afraid so. They were selfish evenings, I see it now. We thought of no one's happiness but our own. Henceforth, Jack dear, we live for others. Now I must go and dress. Miss Blake calls for me at 8. There is a meeting of sandwichmen at half-past."

It was half-past 10 when Mrs. Newlyn came home. She found her husband sitting over his cigar and a novel.

"Well, how did the meeting go off?" he asked.

"Splendidly, splendidly," his wife exclaimed, her charming face aglow with enthusiasm. "O, Jack, when I see what a great deal of noble work I can accomplish I am filled with joy. Miss Blake says I shall be of immense use. But tell me, what have you been doing with yourself while I have been away?"

"I? O, I dropped in on Barnes, one of my old cronies, you know, and very thankful I am I did so."

"Very thankful? Why?"

"Because, curiously enough, I found him deep in a scheme of rescue work of a most novel and original kind, and he invited me to join the movement, and I have done so. Our lives now, Ethel, shall be devoted to this work."

"O, Jack, I am so glad! You will be able to do such a lot of good."

"Well, I hope so, I hope so."

"Now tell me all about it, dear? I am most anxious to learn in what way Mr. Barnes' scheme differs from ours. What class of people are you going to reform—the scavengers, the dockers?"

"O, no; those we leave to you ladies. Barnes says that the influence of woman upon man applies to this sort of work just as it does in other ways, and that the influence of man upon woman is the same."

Mrs. Newlyn looked slightly puzzled.

"The—influence—of—man—upon—woman?" she repeated.

"Just so."

"But I don't understand?"

"Why, it's this way. Our work will be among women. Barmaids——"

"Barmaids?" And her face turned pale.

"Ballet girls, and nurses. We shall hold meetings—social meetings, with light refreshment, such as coffee and buns, and we shall take them aside and talk seriously to them."

Mrs. Newlyn gave a gasp.

"Barnes says it is man's mission."

"Man's mission? O, how dare you talk to me of such a thing!"

"Eh, what?"

"Don't say a word, not a word. Do you want to insult me? O, I wonder how you can come to me with such an infamous proposal! You must be mad to think I should ever consent to it."

"But I consented to you."

"That is very different."

"I fail to see it. You are taking cabmen aside and talking seriously to them. I am taking ballet girls——"

"You sha'n't. I won't stand it. O, do you want to break my heart?"

"Now, darling, you mustn't be selfish. You must learn to give up something. We must live for others."

"You sha—sha'n't I—live for barmaids or ballet girls, the horrid things," Mrs. Newlyn sobbed from behind her handkerchief.

"But you are living for sandwichmen and matchboys."

Mrs. Newlyn bit her lip.

"Jack!" she murmured after a pause.

"My dear."

"Pro—promise me you won't."

"I can't. I gave my word to Barnes."

His wife twisted her lace-fringed handkerchief in desperation.

"I—I'll give up the sandwichmen if you will," she murmured at length.

"And the matchboys and cabdrivers?"

"Ye—es."

"Then on that condition——"

"O, you dear fellow."

"And we shall go back to the old life?"

"Yes, O, yes."

"That's right." And he bent his head and kissed her.

"Newlyn," said his friend Barnes as they sat at lunch the following day, "you're a genius. The idea was splendid, only I'm afraid you've ruined my character with your wife."

"O, I'll make it all right," the young barrister rejoined; "I'll tell her you've given up the scheme." And then they looked at each other and laughed boisterously as if at some hidden joke.—St. Paul's.

SALADS AS A DAILY DIET.

Most Wholesome Food, and Should Be Eaten Every Day.

"The beauty and wholesomeness of the salad should commend it to every American housekeeper," writes Mrs. S. T. Rorer in her cooking lesson on "The Making of Salads," in the Ladies' Home Journal. "I do not refer to those highly-seasoned combinations of hard-boiled eggs and mustard, but to dainty dinner or luncheon salads, made with a dressing of olive oil, a few drops of lemon juice, and a light seasoning of salt, garlic and pepper.

"The salts necessary for the well-being of our blood are bountifully given in these green vegetables; then, too, it is a pleasant way of taking fatty food. All machinery must be well oiled to prevent friction, and the wonderful human engine is not an exception to the rule. Look carefully to it that you take sufficient fatty food.

"The Americans do not use enough oil to keep them in perfect health. While butter is served in some families three times a day, and is better than no fat, its composition is rather against it as compared to a sweet vegetable oil. Fats well digested are the salvation of consumptives or those suffering from any form of tuberculosis. For these reasons a simple salad composed of any green vegetable and a French dressing, should be seen on every well-regulated table 365 times a year. Those who live out of town can obtain from the fields sorrel, long docks, dandelions, and lamb's quarters, for the cost of picking. Where desserts are not used, and I wish, for health's sake, they might be abolished, a salad with a bit of cheese and bread, or water, or cracker, with a small cup of coffee, may close the meal. Where a dessert is used the salad, cheese and water are served just before it, to prick up the appetite that it may enjoy more fully the sweet. At a large dinner the salad is usually served with the game course."

Found Health and Wealth.

As showing the possibilities of intelligent farming in California, the following from the Santa Cruz Sentinel is interesting. The piece of ground—six acres—is a little larger than two San Francisco city blocks: "When E. N. Stocking came to California he was in search of health and a living, but discouragement stared him and his family in the face. To find employment seemed impossible, so he bought on the Branciforte Creek six acres of land. He put the land out in vegetables, berries, and tree fruit, and a chicken-yard. With the combination of thrift, industry, and economy, those barren six acres of a few years ago now fairly bud, blossom, and ripen. Last year three hundred and sixty-five dollars were harvested from a patch of strawberries of one-quarter of an acre and two rods. Just think of it, ye men who let the pennies slip away, and who cry hard times! In the winter he confines himself to raising chickens. Every inch of ground is utilized, and a happy, contented family is the result."

Fire Engine Signals.

The experimental use of signals by the Berlin fire department for its apparatus while on the way to a fire has been found to work so well that the system has now been definitely accepted. It consists in the use of an apparatus looking much like a small semaphore, now in use on the railroads. The appliance is rigged up on the driver's seat, and is visible for quite a distance. When the vehicle is to go straight out the arm of the semaphore is placed straight up; if to go to the right or left into another street, the arm of the semaphore is inclined in that direction. As the signals are always set for the next corner, drivers of other vehicles know at once what they have to do in order to get out of the road of the fire engine or other apparatus.—Philadelphia Record.

LARGEST OF GLOBES.

An Illinois Man Completing a Representation of the Earth's Surface.

George C. Schreiber, of Lincoln, Ill., is now completing what he says is the largest geographical globe in the world.

Graduated from German universities, Mr. Schrieber is not only an expert mapmaker, but is an authority on geography. A little more than three years ago he conceived the idea of building a globe which would surpass all other globes not only in size, but in accuracy and detail. He had made several spheres similar in size and detail to the ordinary school globes, but he wished to outdo his own efforts as well as those of others.

Being of a mechanical turn of mind, Schrieber prepared his plans for the monster sphere with care, and has systematically put them in operation. The first step was to build the frame of the globe. This consisted of a skeleton of cast iron rods radiating from a steel pipe, which forms the axis; the pipe was perforated and the rods were received into it, being carefully graduated in length. Then common telegraph wire was used, a network being woven over the ends of the rods. A rigid and fairly smooth surface having been thus formed, he covered the wire network with several layers of stout building paper, gluing each sheet smoothly to the surface.

Then the globe was a grayish-black sphere five feet in diameter, the exact shape of the earth, being slightly flattened at the poles. It was ready for Mr. Schreiber to begin work upon.

Not much time was required to lay on the integument of the great mass. The preparation used is of Mr. Schreiber's devising. He has used wood pulp and papier mache, but neither was satisfactory. After years of experimenting he invented a composition which serves the purpose better than anything yet discovered. Sawdust sifted in through cheese cloth until it is as fine as flour is mixed with the cheapest grade of varnish known to the trade, and the outer covering is ready. Schreiber covered the big sphere with a layer a quarter of an inch deep of this material.

Two or three weeks' time was required to dry the surface thoroughly, and then the real work commenced. First he marked off the degrees of latitude and longitude with mathematical accuracy, then laid off the entire surface of the globe in half-inch squares, half an inch on the globe being equivalent to a degree of latitude. His work then proceeded systematically, and for the past three years he has spent eight hours daily preparing this map of the world.

LARGEST GLOBE IN THE WORLD MADE BY AN ILLINOIS MAN.

The maps are in relief, every ocean, lake and river being carved out of the surface. All lines or names are engraved on the surface with sharp pointed tools, and then filled with paint, which imparts a pleasing effect and also allows more delicate minuteness of detail than if the names were put on with pen and ink. The route of every railroad and canal in the world is accurately represented, as well as the various steamship routes.

Not content with making his globe the largest of its kind in existence, Mr. Schreiber claims he has prepared the most accurate maps extant. His collection of maps is immense, and not a map of any importance is published that he does not procure immediately. This one item of expense has cost him hundreds of dollars.

That one person should possess sufficient patience to complete this great work seems scarcely credible. Mr. Schreiber has had no assistance in the mechanical part of his labors, save that of his young son, George C. Schrieber Jr. Many offers have been made Mr. Schreiber for his wonderful production, but thus far none have been considered. He is said to have been offered $5,000 for the globe by a Western university. He intends to exhibit the globe at the Paris exposition.

EX-GOV. EVANS' USEFUL LIFE.

Founded a Town and a University and Helped Develop Colorado.

No man had more to do with the growth and development of Colorado than ex-Governor John Evans, who died recently at his Denver home. An Ohioan by birth—he was born in 1814—he had unusual advantages for his day, his father being wealthy. He selected medicine for his profession, and in 1836 began practice among the pioneers of Illinois. Three years later he went to Indiana and in 1845 became a professor in Rush Medical College in Chicago. There he remained eleven years. He was prominent in public affairs and it was his work that led to the founding of the great Methodist institution, the Northwestern University, at Evanston. The latter town—now one of the hondsomest suburbs of Chicago—he founded, and it very properly bears his name. He was not content with being the author of the plan out of which the university grew. He endowed, from his private wealth, the chairs of Latin and of mental and moral philosophy in the amount of $50,000, and later increased that fund to $100,000. He was the first chairman of the Board of Trustees and occupied that position for forty-two years.

He was one of the first to advocate the emancipation of the slaves. He voted for the nomination of Abraham Lincoln at the convention of 1860, and was soon after sent by the President to Colorado to fill the place of Gov. Gilpin. His career in Colorado since that time has been a part of the history of the territory and the State in its march forward. He helped the building of her railroads, the development of her mines, her agriculture, and the general growth of her commonwealth in a manner unparalleled by any one of her citizens.

EX-GOVERNOR JOHN EVANS.

LEARNED BRITISH JURIST.

The Newly Appointed Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland.

Mr. Justice Holmes, who has just been appointed Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland, succeeds the late Lord Justice Barry. He is said to be one of the ablest lawyers and most learned judges on the bench of Great Britain. The new Irish judge of appeal is 57 years old. He is a native Irishman, who was educated in the dingy old halls of Dublin University, and took the law course in a class of several young men who have since become famous as barristers and sharp-witted lawyers in Dublin and elsewhere. He was called to the bar at the King's Inn in 1865, and became a bencher in 1879. It was not until 1885 that he became a queen's counsel. His talents rapidly brought him to the surface of the legal swim in his native city. From 1877 to 1880 he filled the post of Solicitor General for Ireland. From June, 1885, to January, 1886, he was Attorney General for Ireland. Then Mr. Holmes stood for parliament as the representative of Dublin University, and was elected. He sat for that interest from 1885 to 1888. In the latter year he was made a justice of the Queen's Bench for Ireland. Among other offices he has filled is that of privy councillor, to which he was appointed in 1885. Justice Holmes is not a severe judge, and can unbend to enjoy a joke on counsel, or even on the court, when the opportunity presents itself.

Chicago Still the Fourth City.

The consolidation of the municipalities constituting "greater" New York will not reduce Chicago in the rank of cities of the world according to their population. It will be the fourth city in rank after that event, as it is now.

The present city of New York has a population of about 1,900,000. This makes it the third city of the world in the number of inhabitants. Paris is the second, with 2,500,000. New York is third. Chicago is the fourth, with 1,820,000 population as estimated on the directory reports of 1897.

The creation of the greater New York will not place Chicago in the rear as to the place where it now stands. It will still stand fourth on the list of the world's greatest cities. New York, now the third, next to Paris, which is second, will advance to the second place, while Paris will take the third. Chicago will retain the fourth place.

The cities of the world of the rank of 1,000,000 population and over (counting the "greater" New York) are as follows:

1. London	5,000,000
2. New York ("greater")	3,200,000
3. Paris	2,500,000
4. Chicago	1,820,000
5. Berlin	1,680,000
6. Vienna	1,400,000
7. Philadelphia	1,300,000
8. St. Petersburg	1,200,000

This table does not include the estimates of the population of Asiatic and other oriental cities of which no accurate census was ever taken and in regard to which no trustworthy statistics can be produced. The population of Canton, China, is loosely stated at 1,600,000 and that of Pekin at 1,000,000. The cities of Brooklyn, Constantinople, Calcutta and Moscow are well up toward the 1,000,000 class and will probably reach that point before the close of the century.

It is a singular fact that some of the oldest cities, at least some sections of the old cities, are increasing as fast in population as the newest cities, the growth of which has been the marvel of civilization. Some parts of London, if not all parts, are growing in the number of inhabitants as fast as a new town on the American frontier. The population of New York is increasing in a ratio that will make it hard for Chicago to catch up with the greater city, perhaps in fifty years.—Chicago Chronicle.

The Shoemaker's Memory.

Shoemaker Shaw, of Dixon, is possessed of a phenomenal memory. It is at once phenomenally good and phenomenally bad. In the first place, when he measures a customer's foot for a pair of shoes he never puts down a figure of all the numerous measurements, but he has them for all time. It is never necessary for him to measure that foot again. Years afterward he will recall them on an order and make a perfect fit.

That is the only thing Mr. Shaw can remember. A short time ago he was standing at the depot in Dixon talking to a friend. The passenger train pulled out for San Francisco, and still he talked away. Suddenly he exclaimed:

"By George! I was going somewhere on that train. Where in the dickens was I going, anyway?"

He felt in his pockets and found a ticket to Suisun.

"Now, what was I going to Suisun for?"

Again Mr. Shaw searched his pockets, read all the letters he found, and finally came to a subpoena.

"That's it. I was subpoenaed as a witness."

He had to hire a team to get to Suisun in time.—San Francisco Post.

REGISTERING GOLD MINES.

The State Mining Bureau is about to commence the preparation of a register of mines and minerals of the State of California, in a concise tabulated form for convenient reference, and with these tables will be published topogeaphical maps of each county, showing all mineral locations, mills, ditches, etc. The maps will be in three colors and on a scale of two miles to the inch. The maps and mineral tables of the respective counties will be issued separately and as rapidly as completed. It is the intention to give the name of the mine, its owner and superintendent and their addressess; exact location, nearest town, details of character of the mine, such as kind of ore, hanging and foot wall, etc.; also depth of shaft or incline, length of tunnel and such other details as are of general interest, with number of men at work, etc. There will be tables of the quartz mines, the drift and hydraulic mines, mineral springs, mills and arrastras, etc. State Mineralogist Cooper intends sending a sample table to all superintendents and mine owners, with a printed slip asking them to fill in the information desired, and from these slips the large tables will be filled out. None of the information asked for is of a character the mine owner usually likes to keep secret, as nothing is to be said of the value of the ore, output, etc. In fact, the recent reports have never given details of values, this being something the mine owner considers his own business only. But these tables Mr. Cooper is having prepared will give all the information necessary to people who want to learn about any popular mine. In case there are any special features about the mine there will be notice in a separate paragraph. In general, however, the same space will be allotted to each mine, large or small, and if any mine is omitted it will be the fault of the owners or superintendents themselves, as they will all be addressed for the desired information. If they do not reply they "have no kick coming." The object of the Bureau is to advertise the mineral resources of the State. That is what it was established for and the reason it is maintained. The owners and superintendents, however, are as much interested as any one in this matter, and should not fail to respond to the requests for information concerning their properties. The details in the tables will show the development of the respective mines, so that people wishing to look them up may judge of heir character. If the information is satisfactory, and they wish to make further inquiries, the names and addresses of owners and superintendents are given, so that they may be written to. The plan is a good one, and though it will materially curtail the proportions of the printed reports of the Bureau all the really useful information will be given. It is very little trouble for the superintendents to assist the Bureau in completing a full and correct register of the mines and minerals of California, which will be very useful for all interested in the mining industry.

Clarence King, ex-Chief of the United States Geological Survey, and formerly an occasional visitor to Inyo county, was at Denver the other day and remarked: "We are on the verge of a great mining era. The time is not far distant when a man can start out of Denver and travel to Klondike, stopping every night at a mining camp. Already two American stamp mills are pounding away on the borders of the Straits of Magellan, and the day is apppoaching when a chain of mining camps will extend from Cape Horn to St. Michael. I believe we are about to enter upon a century which will open up vast resources and will be the grandest the earth has ever known. Before the end of the twentieth century the traveler will enter a sleeping car at Chicago, bound via Bering Straits for St. Petersburg, and the dream of Governor Gilpin will be realized." Mr. King is on his way East from Seattle, where he has outfitted a party for the Klondike. He believes that if the next steamer from the gold fields brings $1,000,000 or thereabouts, 100,000 men will go into the Yukon country next spring. But the last steamers didn't bring it, Clarence—quite the contrary; and it remains to be seen what the hundred thousand will do about it.

Coroner Hawkins of San Francisco has come off victorious in his bout with Dr. Charles G. Kuhlman over the latter's refusal to testify at an inquest. The Supreme Court refused Kuhlman's appeal from an order of the Coroner committing him to jail for contempt of court for his action. In his appeal Kuhlman contended that his case was not provided for in the list of offenses enumerated in the code. The Supreme Court holds that an order for contempt of court in criminal cases is final.

The needle of a compass does not point directly to the north. In the first place, the north magnetic pole dons not coincide with the north pole, and then east or west of a zigzag line which moves east and west the needle of a compass points east or west of the north magnetic pole. A ship's compasses have to be corrected and the variation determined once or twice a year at all events.

The Hawaiian Senate will meet this month and ratify the annexation treaty with the United States. It is intimated that an extra session of Congress may be called to ratify the treaty and settle the question.

RELICS OF A DEAD RACE.

F. W. Hodge of the Bureau of Ethnology, Smithsonian Institute, has just returned to Washington from an expedition to the enchanted mesa of New Mexico, which has excited the interest of scientists and the daring of exploring parties. It was brought into prominence a few months ago by the expedition of Prof. William Libby of Princeton University, who took rope-throwing mortars, huge kites, balloons and tons of apparatus to scale this hitherto inaccessible tableland. The purpose of the investigation has been to determine whether the summit of the mesa was at one time inhabited by the prehistoric Acoma Indians. Prof. Libby reported no evidence of early occupation. Mr. Hodge's explorations have brought different results, however, for after scaling the mesa he spent some time on the summit and found a number of fragments of pottery, arrows, shells, bracelets, stone axes, etc., establishing conclusively that the mesa was at one time inhabited. Mr. Hodge was sent by the Bureau of Ethnology to examine a series of ruins in Western New Mexico and to attend the snake dance of the Moki Indians. This done he was directed to proceed to the Mesa Escanada and to scale its precipitous walls in any way he saw fit. He procured an extension ladder comprising six sections of six feet each, together with an ample supply of rope, and proceeded to the Mesa on September 3, accompanied by Major George H. Pradt, Deputy U. S. Surveyor at La Guna, N. Mex., who is familiar with that region; A. C. Vrooman of Pasadena, Cal., who acted as photographer of the expedition; H. C. Hoyt of Chicago, and two La Guna indians. The Mesa was determined to be 431 feet from the western plain to the top of the highest pinnacle above the cleft, and the talus at the base of the cleft 224 feet above the plain. The climb was without any serious difficulty until the party reached a great sandstone. The ladders were hauled section by section to this point by means of the ropes, and then fitted together and raised against the cliff. Hodge ascended to the top, and climbing over the slope immediately above, succeeded in lashing the top of the ladder to a huge bowlder that had fallen from above and lodged on the terrace some twenty feet from the summit. The ladder was then ascended by the remainder of the party and the top easily reached. The ascent consumed exactly two hours and a quarter. The explorers had not been on the summit of the mesa five minutes before Major Pradt picked up a fragment of ancient pottery which indicated clearly that the mesa had been visited, at any rate, in former times and that Prof. Libby was mistaken in his conclusions. During the afternoon and the night Mr. Hodge examined the ground critically, while Major Pradt made a survey of the mesa and Mr. Vroman secured a number of photographs. Several potsherds, two stone axes (broken), a fragment of a shell bracelet, and a stone arrow point were the chief evidences of former occupancy on the storm-swept crest, but abundant potsherds, etc., were found in the talus swept down from the summit. All vestiges of the ancient trail ascending the talus and continued thence by hand and foot holes in the solid rock, have been obliterated; but some traces of the holes remain. This verification of an Indian tradition notable for inherent evidence of accuracy is peculiarly gratifying to students of anthropology. Mr. Hodge's researches will arouse great interest among American ethnologists and archæologists, inasmuch as they are said to show that Indian tradition should not be dismissed as mere myths after only casual exploration.

It must be a sort of gloomy satisfaction to a lot of mules to know that often by their help alone the machinery which is to rob them of their occupation can be taken to the scene of its usefulness. It is a satisfaction also to the breeder of beasts of burden to have demonstration that, in this day of steam and electricity and wheels, there are some undertakings which his product alone can carry through. A picture of a street in a Colordo mining town shows how the ingenuity of men and the might of mules combined to solve a very difficult problem in transportation. It became necessary to move a cable from the railway to a distant point over a mountain trail. The cable came by rail on a single spool—12,000 feet of $\frac{7}{8}$-inch steel cable, weighing nearly 15,000 pounds. It must be carried in one piece, but it could not be moved on wheels owing to the nature of the ground to be traversed. The first step was to arrange the cable for packing, and this was done by unwinding from the spool and recoiling it into 130 small coils of some three or four feet in diameter. These were tied with wire and laid about nine feet apart. When this was done sixty-five mules were brought down from the barns and strung along the coiled cable that stretched out over two blocks of ground. Beginning at the lead mule the packers then raised each set of two of the small coils, placed them over the saddle, to which they were firmly lashed so as not to shift from an even balance while on the trail. The work of loading the cable was completed in less than three hours and the train of sixty-five mules with its load started for its destination on the tramway line.

To complain that the poor farmer gets only a few hundred dollars for his wheat, while rich speculators make fortunes, is about as sensible as to point out that the manufacturer gets only a few cents for a pack of cards while the men who use them rake in thousands. In each case those who made the big winnings are gamblers, and they make their money off other gamblers, the difference being that the cards are really handled, while wheat, in most cases, is not touched at all. The farmer exchanges his grain for what it actually brings in the market; the grain gambler merely bets on what the price is going to be.—Kansas City Journal.

"The control of the Government of Honduras by Americans" are words of the American Consul of Honduras, used in his report to the State Department concerning the effect of the concessions recently made to John Jacob Astor et al of New York. The plan includes the construction and control of the Honduras Railway, the management of its telegraph and the dictation of tariff duties, and the establishment of a national bank. It is on the cards to establish a steamship line from Truxillo on the Atlantic coast of Honduras to Belize in Bolivia, and also to instigate emigration from this country of "men who can stand the climate." To all of which the Hondurans agree not to interfere for five years at least.

Spectacles and eyeglasses should be kept perfectly clean and clear, otherwise the eyes will be strained and injured. A famous optician says glasses and spectacles should be placed in a wash bowl and soaked in warm water. Then they should be washed with soap and rubbed with a soft nail brush. Polish them with tooth powder and give them a final rub with tissue paper. A few drops of ammonia may be added to the water in which the glasses are soaked.

The tale of woe begins to come down from the Klondike. Long before the winter is over it will be a sharp and heart-piercing cry of human distress. Then will go up curses long, loud, deep and just, against the inflammatory and lurid style of journalism that promoted the unseemly rush in an untimely season to an inclement clime.

The papers tell of a schooner employed by the Government that was sunk by four sixteen-ton guns that formed a part of her cargo. The guns drifted loose from their lashings, drove the crew to the rigging and finally crashed over the side of the vessel, dragging the doomed schooner with them to the watery depths.

The news of the past week has been somewhat exciting. The strikers in Pennsylvania have been fired on by troops; a frightful railroad accident in Colorado killed forty people, and the yellow fever has broken out in New Orleans.

SUPERIOR COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Walter A. Lamar, Judge.

FRIDAY, Sept. 11, 1897.

Estate of John Welch, deceased—Letters of administration granted to I. J. Woodin.

Real Estate Transfers.

The following deeds were filed for record during the week ending Sept. 17, 1897:

Jacob and Sarah Elkeles to R. O'Neal—Lots in town of Bishop; $10.

Friederike Rhiue to John Basto—Luella mine, Alabama district; $1.

J. H. Cole to Jacob Wooliff—Lots in town of Ballarat; $650.

F. K. Andrews, Administrator, to Henry J. Bell—Land of the Bell estate, near Big Pine; $300.

D. Holland and R. Carrasco to E. H. Edwards—Mine in Beveridge district; $200.

R. Carrasco to E. H. Edwards—Mine in Beveridge district; $300.

M. Bush to W. H. Uhlmeyer—160 acres land near Big Pine; $150.

John F. Millner to Cambrian Milling Company—40 acres and the Cambrian mill property, Round Valley: $10.

The ball at Lone Pine last night was a complete success.

Thos. E. Jones, Jas. Mullen and Jas. Holden were down from Round Valley last Tuesday, on land business.

Mrs. Roughney, of Big Pine, met with an accident on Wednesday last, whereby one of her arms was broken. Her sister, Mrs. J. R. Moffet, went up this morning.

J. S. Stotler, a merchant of Ballarat and Pleasant Canyon, was in town during the week. He hes been appointed Notary Public for that region and completed and filed the necessary bond here.

The baseball games at Lone Pine yesterday were between the Keeler Indians and the Lone Pine club, which was won by the latter, and one between the Independence and Lone Pine clubs. The latter were the winners again, with a score of 15 to 14.

C. D. Wolcott, of Helena, Montana, will reach Nevada on the 22d with a corps of government engineers to make a geographical and topographical survey of the entire Silver Peak district. It will require several months work and cost $23,000.

It transpires that the State reduction of Inyo valuations for taxation purposes is 15 per cent instead of 10, as stated in another item. Auditor Hession estimates that ihe proportion to be paid to the State under this rearrangement will be decreased about $1,100.

A thoroughly equipped Concord coach stage system, all four-horse stock, is now in operation between Mojave, Garlock and Randsburg, all owned by W. K. Miller, he having purchased all the competing lines. The Randsburg stage via Garlock leaves Mojave at 3 a. m. and 9 a. m.; arrive at Mojave at 1:30 p. m. and 2 a. m., making close connections with S. P. trains. Stage leaving Garlock at 7 a. m. Sundays and Wednesdays connects with Keeler stage.

The State Board of Equalization, at Sacramento, finished its labors Sept. 10 Finding that it couldn't raise the valuations of San Francisco, the Board has proceeded to reduce that of all other counties that so desired. Then they levied a State tax rate of 51 cents on each $100 of valuation. Of their proceedings as to this county, a report thereof says: "Arnold then stated that he had telegraphed to the Supervisors of Inyo, Mono and Mariposa, asking if they desired a reduction, and had received an answer to the effect that the latter two counties did not, but that Inyo, like Barkis, 'was willing,' so that county was granted a 10 per cent reduction." The State rate of levy is several cents higher than last year and the country rate may have to be raised also; in any event, after all the monkeying, it will not make a dollar's difference in the sum necessary to be collected nor the amount to be put up by our taxpayers.

Klondike and Trinity have drawn from us many people who would have come to Randsburg had those strikes not been made. But the Trinity bubble has burst and people are leaving there in disgust. Klondike is practically closed to outsiders until the balmy breezes of spring thaw out the frozen passes, and many are now turning their thoughts towards Randsburg and they will soon be making their way here; in fact the tide of travel has already set in and stage men tell us they are bringing in two people to every one who goes out. The building of the railroad has been deferred so long that many people have come to the conclusion that it will not be built, but this idea will soon be dispelled by the inauguration of work on the line, the completion of which will add materially to our prosperity.—Randsburg Miner.

The Secretary of the Interior has decided that marble is a mineral, within the meaning oi both mining laws and grants. Since it has been settled that the substance is not vegetable, generally speaking, the land-grant railroads cannot take it in.

Sold for $105,000

A group of five mines belonging to R. B. Taylor and James P. Mathes of Corona and W. A. Hayt of Riverside have been sold in the Death Valley mining district to an English syndicate for $105,000. The deal was closed at Corona yesterday and the papers were all signed up This is a deal which has been on for some time. These mines are near Anvil Springs, between Panamint and Death valleys. Messrs. Taylor, Mathes & Hayt still own a number of mines in the same group. The mines are all free-milling gold.—Riverside Globe.

This is the most important sale of Inyo mining property that has yet transpired in the "southeastern" districts, although it is about the geographical center of the county. The mines, known as the Treasure, Taylor, Gold Hill, Grand View and Anaconda, are among a group situated on an easterly outlying spur of the Telescope range, overlooking Death Valley, about seven miles southeast from Panamint and ten miles northeast from the head of Pleasant Valley; are at the north end of Butte Valley and near the head of Anvil Canyon, which is a pass leading down through the mesas to about the middle of Death Valley and the sink of the Amargosa. The principal claims were located by Decker and Beckerton several years ago; the Death Valley mining company was organized and obtained United States patents for the five claims named. In course of development some five or six hundred tons of ore has been accumulated on the dumps. Except from the surface and some stratas, it is not "free-milling" as stated, being highly impregnated with copper and some iron. The ore contains a good average in gold; the ledges are strong, with occasional very large deposits or bodies. The country is scienite and quartzite, but mostly lime, covered with iron outcrops and scoria. Pinyon wood is in abundant on the mountains two or three miles above; the nearest good water is four miles distant, at the Indian Arrastra springs, which can be piped to the mines. An easily constructed road will have to be made some twelve or fifteen miles down Butte Valley, passing Hatchet and Anvil springs (which is not in Anvil Canyon) to connect with the old Coleman road, and in the course of time this county will have to build a grade somewhere down the east slope of the Panamint mountains if we ever want to be at all "in it." From the mines mentioned there is a stretch of country extending twenty miles north past Emigrant Pass composed of eruptive, metamorphosed and porphyritic rocks affording the greatest promise to quartz hunters, but there has never been a half dozen prospectors in there who meant business.

BALLARAT BRIEFS.

SEPT. 8, 1897.

The hot spell is over for this year.

Dan Driscoll and H. Wiseman have returned from Los Angeles.

Mr. Martin, owner of the new mill, has returned from San Francisco, where he has been to secure a larger engine for the mill. Ore has begun to come in and operations will begin immediately.

Under Sheriff Willis was in Ballarat a few days this week.

Ballarat is a full-fledged town now, as she boasts a postoffice and semi-weekly mail.

Mr. Wolfe is supplying the town with fresh vegetables, making weekly trips to Owens Valley for that purpose. Now if some enterprising person would keep us in fresh meat, we would be "in town with our pockets full of rocks."

Speaking of rocks, Ballarat can show you some of the finest in the State.

Wm. Jenkins and Wm. Cox of Owens Valley are spending a few days in camp. Mr. Jenkins contemplates bringing his family here, in case the country seems promising enough to warrant the change.

D. M. Rogers has gone to Owens Valley for hay, taking William Calloway jr with him.

NEMO.

A Salt Lake Railroad.

Although so much has been said during the past two years about the construction of a railroad to Salt Lake, and so little, apparently, done, that the people have become weary of the very idea, yet there has been no cessation of the work looking to the desired end. Engineering parties have quietly been over the ground again and again. Survey after survey has been made, profiles have been platted, curves and grades calculated, and a large portion of the preliminary work completed. The route has been determined upon, and it was selected with rare good judgment. It is located where the largest amount of local freight, present and prospective, can be gathered, and, with but two exceptions, the grades do not exceed two per cent.

So far has the work progressed that, within ninety days of the procurement of the necessary funds for construction purposes, grading, tieing and steel laying can be in progress. And, so carefully has the preliminary work been done, that the entire line can be finished and trains operated in twelve months, although it is more probable that about two years will be consumed in construction work.

As to the route that has been selected we are not yet at liberty to make it public, much as we would like to do so. All we have to say is, that if there are people who desire to own some Redlands realty, who are holding off until prices come down, you will serve your own interests by buying quickly. It will be but a comparatively short time before prices will be double what they are now.—Redlands Citrograph.

It Saves the Croupy Children.

SEAVIEW, Va.—We have a splendid sale on Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, and our customers coming from far and near speak of it in the highest terms. Many have said that their children would have died of croup if Chamberlain's Cough Remedy had not been given.—KELLAM & OURREN. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

A Boston Organization.

An interesting organization in Boston is the Needlewoman's Friend society. It is a veteran among women's organizations, having celebrated its fiftieth birthday recently. Its object is to help women in lines of purely feminine work, and work which they can do in their homes. Many women have entirely supported themselves by their needles with the assistance of the society. It has a salesroom at 149 Tremont street, where are kept constantly on sale all varieties of household linens. Very fine work is done on children's and infants' clothes. What is called "Friday work" has been instituted for the older and more infirm of the society's beneficiaries. Sixty women are employed. They come on Friday to obtain work and return it on the next, receiving 50 cents for their labors. Their delight and gratitude at being able to earn this small sum of money regularly are unbounded. The ability with which the work is conducted is shown by the fact that the receipts during the past year have been more than $5,000, and the society has $41,000 in invested funds. The treasurer of the organization is a man, Charles G. White. Mrs. A. Davis Weld is president.

Glass and Paper Clothing.

It is usually admitted that a lady's bonnet is among the most persistent articles to be found. But when ladies take to bonnets of glass they are surely going a step in the right direction. With a glass roof over her head the wearer may be at peace, even in a summer shower.

A Venetian glass manufacturer is turning out glass bonnets by the thousand, the glass cloth of which they are composed having the shimmer and brilliancy of color possessed by silk. No water can penetrate this cloth.

A peculiarly strong and light material for clothing is found in the paper used by the Japanese for underclothes. It is a thin, finely crisped or grained paper, and the clothing is sewed and hemmed as if it were of cloth. It makes a garment strong and exceedingly flexible.

A French paper has been giving reports on the testing of this material and asserts that it is particularly light and tough. When an endeavor is made to tear it by hand, it offers almost as much resistance as does the thin skin used in glovemaking. Even when wet the paper is hard to tear.—Youth's Companion.

The Rage For Red.

Some persons say that red is satan's color. If this be true, satan seems to have marked most of this city's women for his own this season. Never before has there been such a craze for red in every imaginable shade. It has extended to the women's pocketbooks in more ways than one. Leather merchants are bringing out a great variety of chatelaine bags, purses and card cases of flaming hues and are selling them fast. Some of the articles are plain; others have plain silver or gilded trimmings. Bright greens and purples come next to the reds in favor when it comes to leather novelties.

The craze for red seems to have extended literally from our heads to our feet, for rumor says that we are to wear red shoes, bright "cockscomb red," and not only red, but purple and green as well. It is hardly credible that we are to be inflicted with any such barbarous innovation in dress, but if it is to be the seaside summer resort will be just the right kind of a place to try their shocking effects.—New York Sun.

Neck Decorations.

All sorts of exquisite little neck decorations will take the place on summer toilets of the stiff military or stock collars, standing and falling ruches of india muslin, silk canvas, lisse, chiffon, etc., and little turnover collars and paquin points of white batiste and lace, which give such a dainty touch to the gown. One of the latest neck trimmings for airy gowns is a band of linen batiste not more than 1½ inches wide. This is laid in tiny folds with very narrow valenciennes lace on each edge. In the front and just at the back are points of the linen, with a medallion embroidery in each point and lace at the edge. Wide white organdie collars trimmed with lace are a finish for French zephyr gingham and colored dimity dresses, and valenciennes lace and insertion figure largely in the decoration of all thin gowns for the coming season that are made for special wear. For more ordinary uses very fine Irish laces and linen insertions are used, and some of the designs in these trimmings are exquisitely dainty and threadlike.

The Instep's Curve.

A high instep is supposed to be a mark of aristocratic descent, and possessors of the Andalusian mark believe it a sign that their ancestors never bore burdens.

Apart from this childishness, it is certain that a woman with a prettily arched foot is not averse to contemplating its neatness in a well fitting stocking and strapped slipper. The new stockings show embroidery on the instep, instead of the familiar "clocks" on the ankle. It is noticeable that the instep is embroidered in a different shade of color from the tint of the stocking itself.

These dainty pieces of hosiery should be laundered separately and not put in the wash to take their chances of sinking and swimming and being stained with the colors of other stockings.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Promising Young Woman.

Miss Lillian Gordon Pym of Boston has just passed the examination of the Royal College of Music in London and received the degree of associate. Although she is only 16 years old, she has already received a medal for proficiency as a pianist from the associated board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, and also the degree of licentiate from the Royal Academy of Music.

In Denmark and in Norway the posts of shorthand writers at the respective parliaments of those countries are chiefly occupied by women, it having been found that women as a rule succeed far better than men in this form of reporting.

It is the suggestion of a housekeeper that to take down the brass curtain poles at the spring housecleaning, as well as the curtains, and wrap them in tissue paper until the autumn is well worth the trouble.

A Bat In a Tomb.

A queer story is told of a naturalist who died in 1860 and was buried at Blankney, in Lincolnshire. Among his pets was a large gray bat.

This bat was permitted to enter the tomb and was sealed up alive with the corpse of his dead master. In 1866 the vault was opened, and to the surprise of all the bat was alive and fat.

On four different occasions since the relatives of the dead man have looked after the welfare of his pet, and each time it has been reported that the bat was still in the land of the living, although occupying quarters with the dead. It was last seen in 1892.—Pearson's Weekly.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

GLADSTONE AND DISRAELI.

The Ways of the Two Great Premiers Were Curiously Unlike.

I heard nearly all the great speeches made by both the men in that parliamentary duel, which lasted for so many years. My own observation and judgment gave the superiority to Mr. Gladstone all through, but I quite admit that Disraeli stood up well to his great opponent and that it was not always easy to award the prize of victory. The two men's voices were curiously unlike. Disraeli had a deep, low, powerful voice, heard everywhere throughout the house, but having little variety or music in it. Gladstone's voice was tuned to a higher note, was penetrating, resonant, liquid and full of an exquisite modulation and music which gave new shades of meaning to every emphasized word. The ways of the men were in almost every respect curiously unlike. Gladstone was always eager for conversation. He loved to talk to anybody about anything. Disraeli, even among his most intimate friends, was given to frequent fits of absolute and apparently gloomy silence.

Gladstone, after his earlier parliamentary days, became almost entirely indifferent to dress. Disraeli always turned out in the newest fashion, and down to his latest years went in the get up of a young man about town. Not less different were the characters and temperaments of the two men. Gladstone changed his political opinions many times during his long parliamentary career, but he changed his opinions only in deference to the force of a growing conviction and to the recognition of facts and conditions which he could no longer conscientiously dispute. Nobody probably ever knew what Mr. Disraeli's real opinions were upon any political question or whether he had any real opinions at all. Gladstone began as a Tory and gradually became changed into a Radical. Disraeli began as an extreme Radical under the patronage of Daniel O'Connell and changed into a Tory. But everybody knew that Gladstone was at first a sincere Tory and at last a sincere Radical. Nobody knew, or, indeed, cared, whether Disraeli ever was either a sincere Radical or a sincere Tory.—Justin McCarthy in Outlook.

What He Couldn't Do.

A student in one of the Buffalo medical colleges is responsible for the statement that at a certain place of public entertainment one of the boys was bragging of his manifold accomplishments until one of the company lost patience and said in a gruff tone: "'Now, we've heard enough about what you can do. Come, tell us what there is you can't do, and I'll undertake to do it myself.'"

"Waal," replied the student, with a yawn, "I can't pay my account here. So glad to find you're the man to do it."

And the critic paid the score amid roars of laughter from the party.—Buffalo Commercial.

It Was Needed.

"Our church tower goes nearer heaven than the tower of any other church in town," proudly remarked a resident in an interior town to a visitor from the city.

"Well," replied the latter, "I don't know any church that needs it more."—Pittsburg Chronicle.

∴PRIVATE GREEN∴

Of the eighteen recruits who came out to the Fourth Cavalry once upon a time as it was stationed at Fort Bascombe was Private James Green, who was assigned to Company B. From the first hour he came among us we realized that he was of good birth, well educated, and that he had enlisted in order to disappear from the world for a time. There are plenty of such cases, and they excite no particular interest or remark. Unless a soldier wishes to talk of his past he is seldom questioned by his comrades. If a recruit is set down as a gentleman the inference is that family troubles or some wild adventure was the cause of his enlistment, and the matter is never referred to unless he makes an enemy among his comrades. It was the misfortune of Company B to have a captain who was hated by his men and not well liked by the officers of the regiment. But for the fact that he was a blood relation of the Colonel's, his position would have been made so uncomfortable in one way and another that he would have been forced to resign.

He not only drank too much to keep his dignity and maintain the respect due an officer, but was fault-finding and tyrannical, and was given to meddling with petty affairs which were none of his business. Capt. Bowers' excuse for "getting down" on Private Green was that the recruit was impudent and arrogant. When this was sifted down it was found that he had questioned the soldier regarding his past life and the reasons which had induced him to enlist, and this curiosity had been by no means satisfied. He may have been a little stiff in his refusal, as was his right under the circumstances, but his refusal to unbosom himself made the captain his enemy, and for months he was a persecuted man. Few officers descend from their pedestal to "nag" an enlisted man, but Capt. Bowers did it to his own shame and to the scandal of the post. That he was an enemy of Private Green made all the sergeants and corporals down on the man, and as a consequence he put in more days in the guardhouse than in his barracks. It was the general belief that the recruit was trying his best, and that he was by no means given a fair show. Capt. Bowers knew that this was the feeling, but that only made him the more persistent in his course.

After three or four months something happened which should have made the captain change his program and feel that he owed Private Green a debt of gratitude. Companies B and D were scouting along the eastern edge of the great Staked Plains of Texas in search of Indians, with whom we were then at war. At noon one day the two companies separated to beat up both sides of a ridge, and after a mile or so the B men were suddenly charged by about 100 Indians who had been concealed by a fringe of bushes. The troopers were taken by surprise, but made a good fight of it, and after ten minutes beat off their assailants. In their first rush the Indians surrounded Capt. Bowers, who was a few yards ahead of his company, and they sought to make him captive instead of killing him. But for the action of Private Green, who dashed forward to the help of his officer while all others were confused for the moment, the Captain would have been taken.

It went down in the military reports that the new man killed three redskins with his own hand, and all his comrades declared that he saved the leader of the troop. For the next two or three weeks there was a cessation of the naggings, but the fact that he owed his life to the man he had persecuted rankled in the Captain's breast, and after a while some excuse was found for sending Private Green to the guardhouse in disgrace. The man made up his mind that he was being hounded, and that life would be made miserable, and he decided to desert. It is probable that the sentry on duty at midnight winked at the escape from the guardhouse, but it was unfortunate for Green that he should meet his captain face to face before he was clear of the grounds. So it came about, and Capt. Bowers seized and sought to detain him. In the struggle he was knocked down and rendered unconscious for a time, and next morning the chase after the deserter was taken up and pushed with great energy. The country was scoured for days and days, but Private Green had disappeared like a shadow.

A month after the assault and desertion Company B was ordered out alone for a scout over the same ground as before, with orders to pick up the trail of any small war party and follow it up vigorously. Such a trail was found leading straight out upon the sandy desert, but it had not been followed above two miles when the troopers ran upon a large force of Indians in ambush behind a ridge of sand and were badly cut up and scattered. Capt. Bowers' horse was wounded at the first volley, and mad with pain and fright dashed off to the west and could not be checked. The troop broke up under the fire of the Indians, and after suffering a heavy loss made back to the fort in a state of panic, closely followed by the exultant victors. After a mad rush of seven or eight miles the Captain's horse fell exhausted and soon died. The officer knew that his command had been routed, and that he was cut off from it. That the Indians did not pursue him was probably due to their desire to annihilate the company by following swiftly on their heels. He had ridden beyond their ken, and the strong wind had already covered his trail in the sand, but the fort was twelve miles distant, and he was on foot and cut off from it. He had lost his sabre, but still retained his revolver, and was seated on the dead body of his horse and planning what move he should make, when a trooper suddenly appeared beside him.

"You—is it you, Green!" exclaimed Capt. Bowers, as he sprang to his feet.

The other stood with folded arms and made no reply. It was Private Green, the deserter of a month ago. His uniform was torn and stained, and the man had a haggard, wolfish look. He had not been hiding among the hills where the soldiers had looked for him, but out among the sand ridges, where his only living companions were serpents and lizards. He had been driven there by the persecution of the officer who stood before him. The officer knew it as well as he, and he drew his pistol to defend himself from attack. It was two or three minutes before another word passed. Then the Captain said:

"Green, this is bad business. We ran into an ambush, and the company must have been badly cut up. It has been driven back to the fort, and I am alone, as you see. I am going to try and make my way in."

"You cannot do it," was the reply. "Within an hour the Indians will be looking for you. They would be upon you before you were clear of the desert."

"But what shall I do?"

"Come with me."

Private Green strode away to the west and the Captain followed him. It seemed strange that he should do so, but the sudden surprise of the ambush, the mad run of his horse and his finding of the deserter in such an unexpected place all combined to cow his spirit and bring a feeling of helplessness. For two miles and more he followed in the other's footsteps, neither speaking a word. Then they crossed a sand ridge which was higher than the average and descended to a natural sink of about half an acre in extent. In the center of this sink was a puddle of water—such water as a thirsty horse would hardly have touched with his nose a second time. In the breast of the sand ridge was a shallow cave—the home of the deserter.

"Is this—this where you have been hiding?" asked the officer as he looked about him.

"For the last ten days—yes," answered Private Green. "Make yourself at home. You will have to wait here until the Indians clear out."

That was the water the soldier had used to quench his thirst—the shallow cave his shelter from the sun and the night. There was no fire, no food. He must have had food to live, but he must have been compelled to eat it raw. No wonder he looked pinched and haggard and wolfish. He flung himself down on the sands and turned away from the officer. Had the deserter been armed the officer would have feared an attack. While he did not fear that, the man's singular demeanor bred apprehension.

He had been driven to desert—to become a wanderer on the face of the desert—to hunger and thirst and feel that his life was in peril every hour. Capt. Bowers' thoughts were anything but pleasant as he sat in the shelter and looked out upon the recruit who had the outspoken sympathy of four-fifths of the garrison. An hour passed away. Then the officer said:

"Green, I've been thinking we were too hard on you, and I am free to say I am sorry for it. If you'll go back to the fort with me things shall be different."

The man stretched on the sands made no reply. He knew enough of military discipline to know that a court-martial awaited him for striking his superior officer and deserting. They must find him guilty and pass sentence, no matetr how well disposed. He had stood all he could, and on the night of his desertion he had sworn a solemn oath to have revenge upon his captain before he died. Chance had thrown the officer into his hands. As he lay there he was planning murder. He meant to get up by and by and spring upon the Captain, no matter about the pistol. Reduced in strength as he was for the want of proper food, the thought of his wrongs nerved him up and he felt more than a match for the man at his back. After a while, however, the thought of bloodshed left him, and he smiled grimly as he got a new plan. The sun was almost down as he roused up and said:

"We must be moving—follow me."

"Which way?" asked the officer.

The recruit headed for the west, out upon the open desert, without a reply, and the Captain followed him in a dazed and wondering way. The sun went down and they toiled on. Darkness came, and yet they walked. At first the Captain knew that they were going west. When darkness came he lost his bearings, just as the soldier had planned he should. By and by the two were walking around in a circle, each plodding along with his head down, and neither asking nor answering questions. Of a sudden the recruit disappeared. The officer peered through the darkness, but could catch no sign of human form. He stopped and listened, but no footfall reached his ear. He had been nervous and apprehensive before, now he was suddenly almost terror-stricken. He was miles and miles from the fort—miles and miles out upon the lonely desert. A dozen times he tried to brace up and fight away the feeling of helplessness, but it was too strong to be shaken off. He should have sat down to wait for daylight, but his fears kept him moving. He called for Private Green—he shouted and shrieked his name a hundred times—but there was no answer. When he had grown so hoarse that his voice could no longer be heard he began running, and he grew yet more fearful.

"YOU—IS IT YOU, GREEN!"

He was not afraid of the soldier—not afraid of the serpents and lizards—he did not fear the darkness. He was afraid of himself. Until midnight he ran and walked by turns, always hoping that every darker shadow was the form of the man he had driven to desertion, but ever disappointed. At length he fell down from exhaustion, and daylight found him groveling in the sand and a human figure seated beside him. When the sun came up Private Green reached out his hand and quietly said:

"Come, Captain; we are going to the fort."

THE RETURN OF CAPTAIN BOWERS.

The officer looked up and smiled vacantly and talked to himself in whispers. Next day at noon he entered the post alone, but the sentinel at the gate caught sight of another figure down in the bushes and knew that the officer and deserter had met.

"Here is Capt. Bowers!" was shouted by a score of privates and officers as the man stood at the gate and stared stupidly around him.

They pressed forward to shake the officer by the hand and question him about his adventure, but he drew away and cast his eyes down and muttered and smiled. He no longer had a mind, and Private James Green was revenged. Months afterward the Captain got about again, but he was so "queer" that his resignation was handed in and accepted, and he drifted no one knew whither.—C. B. Lewis, in the St. Louis Republic.

Victims of Science.

"We have so many in the family that there's really no privacy for a girl who is just engaged."

"What do you do?"

"Well, we've been going up on the roof and sitting together on a little settee with our backs to the big chimney. But we can't sit there any more."

"Why not?"

"Well, a man came to George yesterday and offered him a photograph. George looked at it and almost fell off his chair. It was a picture of us on the roof. George had his arm around me, and I had my arm around George. 'How much?' said George. 'Ten dollars,' said the man. 'The only one, man?' said George. 'Only one,' said the man. George paid the ten. 'Now,' he said, 'just tell me how in the world you managed to get that photograph?' What do you think the wretch said?"

"Well, what?"

"He said he was the man who sent up balloons with cameras attached!"—Cleveland Plaindealer.

New Uses for Glass.

Attention was recently called to the proposed use of glass brick in building. It is now said that the Government of Switzerland has approved the use of glass for making weights to be employed with balance-scales. A peculiarly tough kind of glass is to be selected for this purpose. From England comes the suggestion that glass would be a better and more lasting material than stone for making monuments which are exposed to the wearing action of the weather.

GOWNS FOR THE GIRLS

LITTLE FOLKS ATTIRED MUCH LIKE THEIR ELDERS.

Styles for Women Are Tastefully Adapted to the Requirements of Little Girls—Latest Decrees of the Fashion Makers Are Suggested.

Modes for the Miss.

New York correspondence:

SO tastefully are the styles for women adapted to the requirements of little girls' dresses, that the small fashionables of this season are attired much more like their elders than is usual. Ordinarily to copy adult fashions at all closely is to make their small wearer seem like a prematurely old tot, which is surely an unpleasant result. So the rule with wise mammas has been to have in their small daughter's dresses merely a suggestion of the latest decrees of the fashion makers. But just now summery stuffs and delicate trimmings of insertion, lace, embroidery and tucking are all the rage for adults, and most of these characteristics can be transferred to half-size gowns without making them seem too elaborate or dominated by freakish fads. Muslins, organdies, lawns, mulls and liberty silks are the popular materials for Miss Tot's best gowns, gingham, prints, and challies are much used for her morning and afternoon dresses; and all have very much similar treatment to that given to big sister's dresses from such stuffs. Take the little dress of this first picture as an example; it was pink liberty silk, crossed in skirt and blouse with white lace insertion, tucked for the entire length of the sleeves, and finished with dark red sash and yoke. Your ambitious maid of 20 would hardly plan her gown more elaborately, and she certainly would be fortunate if the result were prettier.

So great is the elaboration in tots' wear that dressmakers and milliners complain of it. They say the advent of the first little daughter many times spoils the mamma as a customer, because she pays so much attention to the chick's get-ups. There are tales, grewsome to dress and hat makers, of mothers sacrificing their swell hats to the craze for decorating the little daughter. But, after all, where is the satisfaction in getting under your own great hat when little Adele will look a perfect dream in it? Adele is wearing hats as big as her mother's, and made in just about the same way. They are all fluff, knife pleating, and great bows of ribbon, else a dainty mesh of brilliant straw, with a lot of wild roses shadowing it and a cloud of tulle caught in passing, like a fog in a flower garden. One of these hats is pictured here, a rough white straw, its high crown encircled with a pleating of muslin alternating with ribbon and lace, a pretty bow of these materials rising at the side. The wide brim was faced with doubled rose pink taffetas, and this again was faced with pleated muslin.

Patent leather toes and fancy tops, buttoned and laced shoes, and dainty gaiters are the usual wear, though now and then something like the old-fashioned buckled slipper is worn. No lace, embroidery or needlework is too fine or too elaborate to put into Miss Eight-Year's best dress. The left hand one of the two in the next illustration was made of white batiste and lace, and consisted of a jaunty skirt tucked several times near the wide hem, which was finished with a lace ruffle. The bodice was pleated and cut out at the neck, where it was completed by a lace ruffle. The belt was a band of lace insertion, and narrow lace frills finished the small sleeve puffs. The skirt of the other dress was a deep flounce of embroidered batiste lined with white taffetas. Its sleeveless blouse was white batiste banded with three rows of hamburg embroidery, and the jacket was navy blue cloth with deep sailor collar and revers of white pique edged with a narrow gathered frilling. These jackets for the outdoor rig are a pretty notion, and in colored pique they are very dressy. They come in pink, blue, or pale yellow, and are trimmed with lace, pleating of needle work or dotted muslin. They go on over little gowns of transparent material made over silk to match the pique of the jacket, and the effect is delicious.

A TWELVE-YEAR-OLD IN CLOTH.

BOTH DRIVER AND STEED IN STYLE.

Black shoes and stockings are the rule with children, though white stockings and little black-strapped slippers are often worn, especially by the wee maids. Up to twelve and thirteen years there is no effort made to outline or shape the figure, and the waist line is not marked by the least bit of pinching. Many of the little tots are gotten up deliciously with great beplumed hat and lace-trimmed gown, and the pink and dimpled arms are left bare below the shoulder puff. A few valiant mothers put the fat little legs into socks and allow the leg to be bare above the top of the sock, but this is more common for boys than girls.

Many girls of twelve or thirteen are put into dresses that follow mother's fashions closely, especially in the cloth gowns. In the fourth picture is one of this type, its material being corn-colored light-weight cheviot. Its bodice had a shirred front of white mull and a square yoke concealed by the lace ruffle that fell from the collar. Commencing at the side seams were straps of the cheviot buttoning in the center, the belt and collar being made to match. Similar straps gave the cuffs and garnished the puffs of the sleeves. The hat was a black straw tam-o'-shanter, with corn-colored mull as trimming.

CHAMPION SNAKE STORY.

How a Glass Snake Managed to Get His Sundered Parts Together.

"During my early boyhood I heard a great many stories about the glass snake," said Traffic Manager J. G. Schriever of the Southern Pacific Company a day or two ago, "but it was a good many years before I placed any credence in the fact that the glass snake ever existed. It happened in an odd sort of a way (my belief in the fact) and the existence of the creature was made manifest during a most delightful outing spent some years ago in western Texas. In company with a number of friends I was camping on the banks of a small stream in the hill section and it was during a jaunt along the banks of the stream that we came across a peculiar looking snake about eighteen inches long lying in the sun upon the top of a smooth rock by the creek. I took up a stick to kill the snake, but before the stick reached it it suddenly went into pieces, just for all the world as if it had been in sections, the several joints remaining upon the rock, the head excepted, which dropped over the side of the rock into the grass. There was no blood spilled and the joints looked as if they had been smeared on the ends with sealing wax. To say I was surprised would express it mildly. I had never seen anything like it before.

"I concluded to take away a section of the glass snake, for such my companions termed it, for a momento. I wrapped a joint in a piece of paper and took it to camp. That evening I unrolled it and after a good look tied it about the middle with a stout piece of string and suspended it from a low branch near the tent. Then we all went to sleep. In the morning before we had drunk our coffee I thought to take a look at the section, and, to my unbounded astonishment, instead of a joint I had a whole snake. I was paralyzed with astonishment. I did not see how in the deuce a snake could grow from a single section, even if it was a glass snake, but the solution to the problem was even more remarkable than my first conjecture. The head and tail of the snake had set out on a still hunt for the missing joint and, having found it, had managed to reach it as it swung at the end of the string. And not caring to again become separated from so important a portion of its bone and sinew had preferred to dangle in midair, possibly hoping by some unlooked-for circumstance to regain its liberty. Touched by so remarkable an exhibition of snake sagacity, we untied the string and the glass snake glided into the verdant fastnesses of the forest. I have never seen another reptile of the sort."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Wouldn't Trust the Jonahs.

A remarkable story of coincidence and sailor superstition was told by the survivors of the John Carey on their arrival the other day at Auckland, New Zealand. The John Carey, a trading brig, ran into dirty weather and sprang a leak, which at last forced the captain and five others to take to the only boat left uninjured. They were picked up by the Ladybird, another trader, which next day went ashore a total wreck. Two days later, a third trader, the Brightwell, hove in sight, and being signalled by the castaways, sent a boat to take them off. The John Carey's men were the first to embark, and, going through the surf, the Brightwell's boat was upset and the occupants were drawn on board half drowned. At this disaster the Ladybird's crew set up a cry of "Jonah." The J. C.'s people, they said, had been twice wrecked and to embark with them again was certain death. And so firm was their faith in the old supersition that when the Brightwell sent a second boat they actually refused to be rescued, preferring to stay where they were and take their chance of another ship coming that way, to sailing in company with a crew of Jonahs! Accordingly, the Brightwell sailed away with the six survivors, who must have experienced lively and varied emotions when, the very next day, a heavy sea broke on board, stove one of the boats, and carried away a portion of the bulwarks. However, the weather cleared, and the much-harrassed and luck-tormented John Careyites were eventually landed in safety at Auckland.—Sydney Bulletin.

A Remarkable Literary Fact.

One of the most remarkable things in literature is the guess made by Dean Swift, who a century before the moons of Mars were discovered makes Gulliver say of the Laputan astronomers "They have found two satellites which revolve about Mars, whereof the inner most is distant from the planet exactly three diameters of the planet; the former revolves in the space of ten hours and the latter in twenty-one and a half hours." This is what the astronomers claimed 100 years later. The inner moon is really 10,000 miles from the planet, 2,000 more than Gulliver's estimate would make it, while the outer moon is 15,000 miles away or 5,000 less than that allowed by Gulliver's strange astronomers.

Largest Wood Growing Countries.

According to the report of the Chief of the Forestry Division of the Department of Agriculture, the United States, not including Alaska and the Indian reservations, contains 495,000,000 acres of forest. According to Meihall, Russia comes next, with 426,000,000 acres; Brazil is third, 135,000,000; Canada fourth, with 64,000,000; Norway and Sweden fifth, with 61,000,000; the Austra-Hungarian Empire has 46,000,000, and Germany 32,000,000 acres.

It is said of every very poor person that he has very rich but very mean kin.

FARM AND GARDEN

A Summer Milkhouse.

In the summer time a milkhouse built like the one in the illustration is very convenient. It is adapted to situations where there is no natural spring, but where the water must be pumped around the milk. A man who has tried a small house of this kind says of the one he built: It is 6 feet square and 6 feet high at the eaves, which is large enough for the milk of two or three cows. The house is built under a large grape arbor, about 20 feet from my kitchen pump. The milk tank, which is 12 inches deep and 14 inches wide at the top, extends along the north side. It has a screen cover, which may be covered with cloth in very hot or dusty weather. A table with a shelf underneath occupies the southeast corner. A space just above the level of the tank, 2 feet wide and extending on all sides of the house, is covered with wire screen. Shelves above the screen and below the tank give sufficient room for milk and butter dishes. The milk is set in pails. A galvanized iron pipe leads from a small tank at the side of the pump down 18 inches below the surface of the ground, across the 20 foot space and up again to the level of the milk tank. An overflow pipe at the other end of the tank carries off the water after it has reached the proper height in the tank. Another pipe, at the bottom of the tank, is used for emptying it when desired.

SUMMER MILKHOUSE.

Handling a Bulky Fodder Crop.

In cutting ensilage or fodder, a little work transferred from hand to horse power often goes a great way to lessen expense. In the illustration, which is taken from Farm and Home, a simple method is shown of unloading fodder or hay. Two ropes about 50 feet long, depending on the length of the rack and height of load to be drawn, are used, one end of each being fastened to the hind axle of the wagon. They are then passed back and over the top of the rack between the two outer boards on either side. While loading, the ropes may be brought back under the outside of the rack and fastened almost any place on the rear part. When the load is completed, the ropes are drawn over the fodder and tied to the back of the rack, acting in the capacity of a binding pole. To unload, fasten the ropes to a beam, and with the team draw the wagon slowly out from under the load. The first few times may not always prove successful, but with a little practice the wagon may be unloaded in a few minutes.

UNLOADING FODDER MADE EASY.

Injury from Over Pruning.

Most of our American varieties of grapes are very strong growers, and will not bear the severe pruning to which German and French vineyardists subject their vines. We plant our vines farther apart than do European vintners, and must leave proportionally more wood. As the vines grow older it is generally found necessary to take out alternate vines so as to let each vine occupy twice the trellis space originally allotted to it. Vines thus treated are much less liable to mildew. At the same time some root pruning is advisable by cultivating more deeply, and keeping the roots of the vines where they will be less affected by sudden changes of temperature that usually precede attacks of mildew and grape rot.

Pruning Is Important.

The neglect of pruning for a single year is never less than a serious injury to any fruit tree. Without proper vigilance dozens of shoots will spring out and grow, to the injury of the tree, not only for that season, but for a considerable time after. "Thumbnail" pruning is always the best, because it leaves no wound that will not cover itself the same season. Every observer can see that this is true; but many orchards show a neglect to apply the truth.

Profit in Bran Feeding.

Every time a farmer buys bran for feeding his stock he also buys fertilizers. Bran and cotton-seed meal are rich in all the elements required in the soil, and the cost is repaid by the increase in weight of the animals. If the farmer can make the gain from the animals pay for the feed there will be a fair profit left in the manure heap. But this profit is valuable according to the manner in which the fertilizing elements are preserved while in the heap. It is in the management of the manure that the profit is retained and future crops increased.

Straighten the Stream.

It does not matter much how crooked the little stream may be that meanders through pasture lands. But if the field is to be cut for hay, or especially if it is desired to use the land for plowing, it is important to have the brook straightened, so as to take as little room as possible. In many places a straight, deep ditch, cut to lead off a stream that only runs in the spring, may be profitably turned into an underdrain. A space a foot square each way, with an even fall, will carry off an immense amount of water. If large, flat stones can be got for covering and heavy stone for siding such a drain is not expensive. The convenience of plowing over it and the land saved will make it pay.

How Plants Get Water.

The fact that in wet weather the soil dries slowly even when covered with plants that ordinarily drain the soil rapidly, leads some to think that when wet the leaves absorb moisture on them. But the fact can be equally well accounted for by the knowledge that water on the leaves prevents them from evaporating the moisture brought from the soil by roots. This soil contains some mineral elements which unite with carbonic acid gas from the air in forming plant tissue. While the leaves are wet they cannot absorb carbonic acid gas. This with the effect of stopping evaporation, makes the sapy growth which many, jumping too quickly at conclusions, think must be caused by the direct absorption of water through the leaves.

For Sorting Hogs.

A sorting pen is most convenient when a herd of hogs is to be divided. Mine, says a correspondent of the Orange Judd Farmer, is built alongside a partition fence; a and b represent the two compartmenas. The hogs are driven from the pasture through the gates at h and d into b. To sort them, one man stands at d and operates the gates d c and f e. Another man gets into the pens and drives the hogs out, one at a time. The man at the gate turns them into the pasture, g, or into the pen, a, as desired. If the hogs are coming in a string three feet apart, they can be put where wanted by simply swinging the gates. Recently we started in with a bunch of about 100 and sorted out 55 in 15 minutes without a mistake.

PEN FOR SORTING HOGS.

Fancy Farmers.

"Fancy farmers," or the owners of "fancy" stock, are frequently ridiculed, but it is due to their willingness to improve stock and their persistency in adhering to their belief in something better than scrubs that the farmer is benefited. The man of capital goes on with his improvement of stock, and may suffer loss at first, but after a while he begins to make profits, the farmers being lifted up with him, as the farm on which improved breeds are specialties becomes a fountain source from which superior animals are distributed in all directions.

Farm Notes.

In all breeding defective points are more easy of reproduction than desirable products.

One great help in killing out weeds is not to allow any to mature seeds. Look after this now.

The triple income from a flock of sheep, wool, lambs and mutton come in at different seasons.

System in feeding and breeding to and for correct standard is essential in the management of all stock.

Allowing weeds to grow is robbing the soil of needed plant food and moisture. Keep the weeds down.

A hog is not necessarily a filthy animal, and if he is to make meat for food it is essential that he should be cleanly raised.

Keep the young pigs growing during the summer while on good pasturage, and it will be much easier to fatten them in the fall.

When wheat is to follow corn it will lessen the work of seeding very materially if the cultivation of the corn has been clean and thorough.

Cut wheat when the grain begins to harden well, and shock up as fast as cut. Wheat requires but little curing and should be stacked soon after cutting.

The sprouts which grow up around the base of a tree from the roots should be cut out as fast as they appear, as they appropriate plant food that should nourish the tree. They are also unsightly and destroy the appearance of an orchard.

Growers who raise cucumbers for market say the first crop from a particular field is better than any subsequent one. The soil becomes filled with enemies of the crop and a change is necessary. Some growers find it advisable to take new soil every year.

He Built the Bridge.

A Western railroad having its headquarters in Chicago was reorganized and some new officials were brought on from the East. There was a readjustment of titles and the superintendent evolved a system by which the duties of every employe were to be most clearly understood.

John Connors, who had helped to build the road and who had been on the pay roll for years, was advanced to the title of Master Mechanic and Superintendent of Maintenance of Way.

About a week after his appointment he was hastly summoned to the office and was given an order:

"To John Connors, Master Mechanic and Superintendent of Maintenance of Way: This is to inform you that culvert No. 163, in section 14, one and one-half (1½) miles east of Effner, has been destroyed by fire. You will proceed with all possible haste to the Chief Engineer, who will provide you with the necessary plans and specifications. By requisition on the Purchasing Agent you will be enabled to secure such material as may be necessary and the Superintendent of Motive Power will place at your disposal——"

There were other directions, but when John Connors had read this far he folded the letter and put it in his pocket.

"That's what we call the Wilson culvert," said he. "I'll 'tind to it."

That was Saturday. On Monday morning the General Superintendent came to his office at 10 o'clock, pushed a bell and directed the Private Secretary to order the Special Messenger to summon the Master Mechanic and Superintendent of Maintenance of Way.

John Connors came to the office.

"Mr Connors," began the General Superintendent, "have you received from the Chief Engineer the plans and specifications for that new culvert in section 14?"

"I'll tell you," replied the Master Mechanic and Superintendent of Maintenance of Way, "the bridge is done and the trains have been runnin' since daylight, but I haven't seen the picture of it yet."

Where the Office Sought the Man

Talk about Poo Bahs, Representative King of Utah claims to carry the prize for officeholding.

"I once held six offices at the same time," he said yesterday to a reporter. "In the early days of Fillmore City, in my State, we actually had more offices than men, consequently I was City Assessor and Collector, City Recorder, City Attorney, County Attorney, member of the Board of Education, and member of the State Legislature. That was a pretty good handful for a young man not 22 years of age."—Washington Post.

RALROAD TALK.

The San Francisco Chonricle says that according to recent telegraphic advices the projectors of the new railway now building from Kramer, on the line of the Sante Fe Pacific, into the Randsburg mining district on the Mojave desert, hope to make their line a link in the much-talked-of connection between the Santa Fe and the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railway. It is set forth that the line from Kramer will afford a means of effecting a junction of the two railroads with much less expense than would be incurred from the construction of a line from Mojave to Bakersfield through the Tejon.

Engineer Storey of the Valley Road, when asked about the matter, said that he had not heard of any negotiations looking to the use of the new line into into Randsburg as a connecting link between the Valley Road and the Santa Fe, and from what he knows of the country through which the connecting line, as proposed, would have to be built, he is inclined to take very little stock in the proposed undertaking.

"A connecting line that would afford a union with the Santa Fe, using the line now building from Kramer as a link, would necessarily be built through Walker pass, and that would mean the construction of forty miles of the road through a rough canyon. The height of Walker pass does not commend it for the purpose of a transcontinental railroad. According to the United States Geological Survey it is 5322 feet high. The Tehachapi pass, through which the Southern Pacific line is built, is 3832 feet high, and the Tejon pass, through which the Santa Fe has a survey, could be passed, with the aid of a tunnel one mile long, at an altitude of not more than 2500 feet. Furthermore, the distance from Randsburg to Bakersfield via the Walker pass is just as great as the distance from Mojave to Bakersfield by way of the Tejon pass, and I cannot see the advantage of the new route proposed."

The Randsburg Miner has a letter from the President of the Randsburg Railway Company which says:

"The Randsburg Railway Company have contracted with the Union Construction Co. for the construction of its railway from Kramer to the town of Johannesburg, and the equipment of same, to commence within twenty days, and to be completed and in operation on or before the 10th day of December, 1897.

"The road will be owned and operated as an independent line, handling the freight and passenger business for both the Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific, making the town of Johannesburg its terminus and the distributing point for the Rand Mining district.

"You may rest assured that our company will do all in its power to develop and build up the districts tributary to its line."

Secretary of the Interior Bliss has rendered a decision which affects all the Western railway grants. The case on which the decision was made is that of the Pacific Coast Marble Company against the Northern Pacidc Railroad Company and the State of Washington. It involves the title to marble lands in the State of Washington, a portion of which was claimed by the railroad company as indemnity for lands lost, and a portion by the State of Washington as a part of a school grant. The question involved was whether marble is mineral within the meaning of the mining laws and also under the terms of grants to the railroad company and State. The Secretary decided that marble is mineral within the meaning of both mining laws and grants, and is, therefore, not subject to selection or patent to either railroads or State. The Secretary also decided that this ruling applies to all substances known as mineral by the recognized authorities. Mineral lands, as defined by the Revised Statutes of the United States and declared to be available for sale to individuals in limited parcels, in order that their resources may be developed, are described as "mining claims upon veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper or other valuable deposits heretofore located." Ever since the present law has been in operation, more than twenty-five years, the Department of the Interior has permitted settlers to settle on land containing deposits which, while not legitimately mineral, are designated under the rules of the Department to be metalliferous. The settlers of the West who have developed the rich deposits of asphaltum in Utah, borax in Nevada, gypsum in the Dakotas, fine marble in Washington and fire clay and building stone in Montana will not be secure in their possessions unless the Supreme Court sees fit to reverse the opinion of Secretary Bliss.

Within a few years the question has been raised whether sun spots are really depressions or holes in the sun's surface, as they have generally been considered to be by astronomers. Prof. Ricco of Catania concludes, as the result of a long series of observations, not only that the spots are cavities in the sun, but that their depth can be approximately measured. He states that the average depth of twenty-three sun spots measured by him was about 640 miles.

A week or two ago a few cases of yellow fever were discovered in Alabama, and now the disease is spreading and threatens to cause an epidemic in the South.

THE COUNTRY SCHOOL TEACHER.

With the increased facilities for procuring a higher education throughout the land, the philosophical study of methods of imparting knowledge and the new importance everywhere attached to the work and influence of primary teachers, it seems incredible that in California there should be so little advance in the standard of excellence of teachers of country schools. With comparatively few exceptions the country school seems to be regarded by thoroughly qualified young men and women as a last resort for making a livlihood, a dreary penance and exile, an unproductive waste for the expenditure of talent, a treadmill in a social desert. The country school district suffers accordingly, and is commonly a training ground for young and inexperienced teachers, many of them incompetent, but who are forced by the requirements of law to serve a short apprenticeship in the country before they can transfer their incapacity to a town school. As one enraged old farmer trustee recently put it, his district had been for years a training ground for "the breaking of broncho teachers."

A very large proportion of the common school teachers of our State are women, and comparatively few take up teaching as a serious purpose or a life profession, but merely adopt it as a means of providing themselves with pretty gewgaws or books, to maintain creditable wardrobes or perchance to support themselves until the right young man shall come along and relieve them and their parents of this burden. Be it said to their credit that they are usually a sweet-tempered, amiable lot, correct of principle, ladylike in demeanor, conscientiously intending to do their full duty, but with the most obscure idea of what that duty is. To arrive promptly at the schoolroom at the specified hour, to maintain, by hook or crook, a certain degree of order in the schoolroom, to prevent Manuelito and Miguelito and Johnnie and Neddie from breaking each others heads on the playground and to lead all the children through a certain specified and prescribed amount of text book learning, is to the majority of these little schoolmarms the sum and substance of their obligation to the State, and they would open wide their eyes and look askance at anyone who should suggest that these were the most worthless and insignificant portions of their duties. The inspiring discussions and fresh ideas advanced at the annual institutes, which the law compels them to attend, fall without meaning upon most of these immature minds, or are considered merely as the pleasant entertainment of an hour, of practical value only to teachers working under the organized system of town schools, but impossible of application where there are few conveniences and a single teacher must handle classes in all the primary grades.

In reality the entire school system of our State, from our great universities down, presents no such promising field for effort as our country school. Town children, and even students in the higher educational institutions, regard their privileges as a matter of course, and are frequently correspondingly indifferent to them, while the country boy and girl, traveling long distances over poor roads, and with difficulty spared from tasks at home, realize at an early age the value of their opportunities. The percentage of health and strength among them is far in advance of the town-bred pupil, and they consequently bring greater intellectual vigor to their work. They have few dissipations and amusements to tempt them aside. Their lives are often lonely, and new zest and delight attaches to every term and session, which brings them into contact with their young companions. They are more single of purpose, and singleness of purpose means power of concentration. Moreover, their eyes, unscarred by the countless sights and events which distract the attention and fritter away the mental strength of the town pupil, are open and receptive. The intelligent teacher, who understands the mental culture of this type of child, is like a painter with a piece of clear, white canvas before him, or a sculptor with a block of virgin marble awaiting his magic touch. From the beginnings of our Nation's history a large majority of her strongest statesmen, including almost every one of colossal character, and a very large proportion of her women of finest balance and clearest intellect, have been country-bred.

To insplre these young lives with worthy ambitions, to stimulate the best use of their several abilities, to teach them self-mastery, to broaden their sympathies and instill new ideas of life and its responsibilities; in a word, to do the very best and truest and finest work possible in the way of character-molding, that most essential part of all education, is a task not to be despised by our ablest men and women.

But the average young country-school teacher would blankly rejoin that character-building is not down on the course of study!

Life in a country district presents its own charms and advantages to one who is not ashamed to go to school to Dame Nature or to draw upon her for healing and inspiration. Especially is this true of the country districts of California, where the weather presents few inclemencies, and mountain, valley, forest and canyon present a series of delightful pictures. No man or woman is so wise that observation and close study of outdoor life in these regions may not add something to the accumulated stock of knowledge. None so strong and capable that a greater strength and poise may not be acquired from the observation of simple lives and participations in their joys and sorrows. Towns are mere accidents of civilization. Rows of tall buildings and factory smoke obscure the horizon, but the hills and valleys are eternal truths.

San Francisco can boast of having two Boards of Supervisors at present, to keep her in running order.

There is an eminent physician in London who takes the position that the health of the people would be, on an average, better and the duration of human life longer, if there were not a practicing physician in the world. In other words, he favors the idea often tersely expressed in the words, "Physicians kill more people than they cure.

Celebration of Mexico's Independence.

The Sixteenth of September, being the Fourth of July of Mexico, was celebrated with true patriotic fervor by those of her natives living in Inyo county. Lone Pine appeared resplendant in the red, white and green and some of the spirit of the good old days, when that town represented much of the wealth of the county, was evident. One of the closest baseball contests ever witnessed in the county was played between Lone Pine and Independence—the former winning by one point. The literary exercises were of an impressive character, all honor being paid the Mexican, American and Chilanean flags. Mexico's beautiful national song was rendered by a selected choir, notable among whom was little Miss Trixie Boland, whose knowledge of music and of Spanish proved excellent training. The ball of the year was given in the evening and until broad daylight a throng of dancers showed their appreciation of the exquisite music made by Messrs. Celayo, Castro and Cruz. As the dancers departed a happy Vive la Mejico was borne on the morning breeze.

The chemical fire engine took its departure for Randsburg on Wednesday morning, preceded by three big wagons and ten horses. It will go as far as Bishop, where another outfit will hook on and tow it further toward its destination. It will be a curiosity to many persons along the road who have never seen such an apparatus. The Randsburgers propose to give it a grand reception when it arrives. The money received from the sale of the machine will help out our Fire Commissioners.—Bodie Miner, 18th.

More money has been spent in steamboat passage to Alaska than has been taken out of the Klondike. The excitement has cost $10,000,000 up to date and produced about $2,000,000.

OSITO, 2:16½.

At the State Fair at Sacramento on Wednesday, the 15th inst., the following race was trotted. Osito is Irv. H. Mulholland's bay stallion, who is making the circuit of the California tracks this year:

The starters in the 2:21 trot were Nancy W., Palermo, Osito, Winelia, Claudius, Luster, Our Jack, Prince Gift and Fanadma. Osito brought $20 in the pools against $8 for Claudius, $5 for Our Jack and $5 for the field.

First heat—Fanadma was first at the quarter, where she led Claudius by a length, Osito third. Going up the stretch Fanadma broke and fell back, Claudius leading at the half by two lengths, Prince Gift second. Around the turn they were well spread out, but in the last stretch Prince Gift went to the front and won by two lengths in 2:17¾, Claudius second, Osito third.

Osito was sold at $7, Claudius $13, Our Jack $2 and the field $20.

Second heat—Nancy W. was running and fell to the rear. Claudius led all the way, coming into the last stretch three lengths ahead of Osito, Palermo in third place. Near the score Osito shot forward and many thought he won in 2:18¾, by a nose, but Claudius' number was run up, Osito second, with Palermo at his wheel and third.

Osito now sold for $20, Claudius $10 and the field $12.

Third heat—Claudius led at the quarter, Palermo second, Osito third, Our Jack fourth. At the half Osito was in front, Palermo second. Coming into the stretch Prince Gift went to the front, Osito second, and Palermo third. It was a drive home between Osito, Our Jack and Prince Gift, the former winning in 2:16½ by a length, Our Jack second and Prince Gift third.

In the pools Osito brought $20 to $6 for the field.

Fourth heat—Osito and Our Jack were even at the quarter, Claudius third and Palermo fourth. At the half Osito led by a length, Our Jack second, Palermo third, and Claudius fourth. In this order they entered the stretch. The struggle home between Osito and Our Jack was a hot one. The former had a head the best of it at the outcome, but had left his feet and was plunging. The judges gave the heat to Our Jack in 2:18, Osito second, and Palermo third.

Our Jack sold at $25 against $17 for Osito and $6 for the field.

Fifth heat—There were only four horses eligible to start, under the four-heat rule, Osito, Our Jack, Claudius and Prince Gift being the only heat winners. Our Jack led Osito into the stretch by a length, Claudius third and twenty yards back. A furlong from the wire Our Jack broke and Osito won by eight or ten lengths in 2:20, Claudius third.

Sixth heat—Osito won in 2:22, Our Jack second and Claudius third.

In reporting this race the Breeder and Sportsman says: "We have always considered that Osito is a M'Kinny of the M'Kinnys—a game little campaigner." Osito won the 2:30-class trot at the State Fair in a field of seven starters, and was second in the 2:24 class, being beaten a head by Peko in the fifth heat after winning two heats each.

BALLARAT BRIEFS.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1897.

Two eight-horse freight teams arrived at Ballarat yesterday, laden with gasoline and other merchandise.

A new engine of higher capacity for the custom mill arrived yesterday.

There was quite an exciting race here yesterday evening. A load of hay arrived from Owens Valley, and the citizens met it out of town and escorted it in. Owens Valley farmers will find Ballarat a good cash market for their hay and grain.

J. S. Stotler, the leading merchant of Ballarat, has gone to Independence to transact some business.

There are several Los Angeles capitalists in town looking for investment.

Mr. Hunt, one of the mine-owners of Ballarat, has just returned from below, where he has been to receive payment for a mine which he sold for good figure, and will invest the proceeds in Ballarat.

Jno. C. Cress, one of the pioneer prospectors of Ballarat, has discoverd about a mile and a half from this place, a large body of cement, that according to the State Mineralogist and other reliable authorities is one of the best known to science. Five claims have been located on the grounds.

Several valuable gold-bearing lodes have recently been discovered in Cld Panamint, and work has begun there at a lively rate.

Thos. B. Pheby & Co. have just completed a wagon road to their mines in Tuba Canyon, which portends that a mill will be erected in that locality very soon.

Gre hauling has temporarily stopped on account of the scarcity of hay. Yesterday there were but three bales in town. The work will be resumed with renewed vigor as soon as the camp is supplied with hay.

A subscription has been raised and a force of men has gone to Shepherd Canyon to put the road in a passable condition for loaded wagons.

She Was "Me."

A gentleman who has a telephone in his house has in his employ a faithful but stupid German girl, who one day responded to the ringing of the telephone-bell.

"Who is there?" came over the wire.

"It is I," replied Katrina.

"And who is I?"

"Why, I am I."

"But who is I?" came over the wire.

"I am me, my own self," retorted Katrina. "How should I be any one but me?"

"But who are you?"

"I am my own self."

"What is your name?"

"Katrina Rupper."

"Well, who is Katrina Rupper?"

"She is me, I, my own self."

And when Katrina heard laughter at the other end of the line she said, indignantly:

"I vill not shtay here to be made a shoke of," and she walked away from the telephone, grumbling: "How could I be any one but me? I let 'em know how to make a shoke of me!"

Native Christian Pastors in India.

Fifty years ago there were in India only twenty-one ordained Christian pastors. There are now about 1,000.

Anecdote and Incident

A customer dropped into a bookseller's the other day (says the Bookman) and asked for a copy of "The Lady of the Aroostook." The clerk seemed to be in some doubt about the title, but after a moment's consultation with another salesman, he came forward and said, blandly: "So sorry we haven't got 'The Lady or the Rooster,' but we can give you 'The Lady or the Tiger.'"

Stephen Girard, the infidel millionaire of Philadelphia, on one Saturday ordered all his clerks to come on the morrow to his wharf and help unload a newly arrived ship. One young man replied, quietly: "Mr. Girard, I can't work on Sunday." "You know the rules." "Yes, I know. I have a mother to support, but I can't work on Sundays." "Well, step up to the desk, and the cashier will settle with you." For three weeks the young man could find no work; but one day a banker came to Girard to ask if he could recommend a man for cashier in a new bank. This discharged young man was at once named as a suitable person. "But," said the banker, "you dismissed him." "Yes, because he would not work on Sundays. A man who would lose his place for conscience's sake would make a trustworthy cashier." And he was appointed.

Mark Twain once attended a missionary meeting in Hartford, at which a missionary made an address. After listening to the agonizing story of suffering, Mark Twain said to himself: "For God's sake, send that plate around, so that I can pour my sympathy into it. I'll give you these four one-hundred-dollar bills, and if I can get a piece of paper, I'll write a check for something more. I can very well spare a little money for a cause like that." But the lecturer went on talking, and as he talked, Twain's enthusiasm calmed. "And when the missionary had been talking for half an hour," he continues, "I had saved one of those bills, and when he had talked five minutes more two of those bills were mine again, and when he had been talking an hour I had won all four back, and, by gosh, when he finally did send that plate round, I borrowed ten cents out of it to pay my car-fare home."

President Lincoln, when he was a young lawyer practicing in the courts of Illinois, was once engaged in a case in which the lawyer on the other side made a very voluble speech, full of wild statements to the jury. Lincoln opened his reply by saying: "My friend who has just spoken to you would be all right if it were not for one thing, and I don't know that you ought to blame him for that, for he can't help it. What I refer to is his reckless statements without any ground of truth. You have seen instances of this in his speech to you. Now, the reason of this lies in the constitution of his mind. The moment he begins to talk, all his mental operations cease, and he is not responsible. He is, in fact, much like a little steamboat that I saw on the Sangamon River, when I was engaged in boating there. This little steamer had a five-foot boiler and a seven-foot whistle, and every time it whistled the engine stopped."

A member of Congress was going home very late a few nights ago (the Washington Post says), when he met a young man who was hopelessly drunk. The Congressman happened to know where he lived, and kindly guided him home. The Congressman had no sooner pulled the bell than the door was flung open and a tall and vigorous woman appeared. She said not a word, but grabbed the intoxicated young man by the collar and gave him a shaking that fairly loosened his teeth. Into the hall she shook him and slammed the door. The Congressman was descending the steps, when the door opened again and his friend flew out as if flung from a catapult. He landed at the foot of the stairs, and the Congressman picked him up. He was very much frightened, and he was almost sober. He managed to gasp out: "We don't live here. We—we moved last week." The really interesting thing would be to know what happened to the man who does live there.

The late Judge Richard Clarke presided in the Atlanta circuit of the Superior Court when one of the most remarkable murder trials was in progress. The evidence was conflicting (says the Washington Post), and the judge was called upon to charge the jury on some new and interesting legal points. The judge was a rapid talker. In this instance it was very important that every word he spoke should be correctly recorded, and he so cautioned the stenographer. Then Judge Clark began. As he warmed up to his charge he was speaking at the rate of two hundred and fifty words a minute. Once he glanced toward the stenographer. That worthy official seemed to be half sleeping over his work and apparently writing very slowly. "Mr. ——, are you getting my words down correctly?" asked the judge. At this the stenographer seemed to wake up. With little concern he replied: "That's all right, judge, fire away. I am about fifteen words ahead of you now."

Kind Fate having taken me to Paris (says a writer in the Sketch), I sat in a corner of the Cafe de la Paix with a native Parisian. Soon a cohort of ragamuffins invaded the boulevards with the last edition of Le Jour. My friend stayed a panting gamin, produced a French penny, and took his five centimes change. I stared a bit, for the boy was so poorly clad that a profit on the paper might have been looked for. "We are very different from you Londoners," remarked my friend, guessing my unspoken thought; "our poor have a code of honor—they work for their living. If I had offered that paper-boy the change, he would have told me that he worked for his living, and did not beg. I should have insulted him with the gratuity." I said nothing, but thought a great deal. Some half-hour later the same boy repassed. I bought a copy of his paper, and gave him twenty centimes so ostentatiously that my friend could not fail to see me. There was a grin, the first syllable of merci and the last of monsieur, and the gamin turned the corner, probably rushing to invest the fortune before the banks closed. I looked round to my companion, anticipating a remark. "You will see," he said, turning to Le Jour, after a moment's silence that might have been felt, "that Greece is now suffering the penalties of her rashness and folly."

The Yap Dollar.

First and last there have been many different kinds of dollars in the United States—silver dollars, gold dollars and multifarious paper dollars of sometimes dubious value; and in other countries, iron, platinum, brass, bone, ivory and even wheat and cotton goods, have done duty as money. But the oddest "dollar" ever seen thus far, perhaps, is that coined, or rather quarried, by the chiefs of the island of Yap, one of the group of Caroline Island in the South Pacific.

These Yap coins are even more cumbersome to carry about than the great silver "daddy dollar" of our own land. Vastly more cumbersome, indeed, since they weigh eighty pounds apiece and are over two feet in diameter! A defaulting cashier would certainly have difficulty in absconding with many of them!

Two of these strange pieces of money may now be seen in the National Museum at Washington. They are circular disks of coraline rock, dull white in color, yet apparently crystalline, twenty-six inches in diameter and from three to four inches thick. At the center of each there is a round hole two inches and a half in diameter.

The Yap chief enjoys a monoply in this singular sort of coinage. When in want of money, he has but to send his slaves to the quarry to fashion as many flat "dollars" as he needs.

His treasury is a number of long poles set on supports in front of the royal hut. The dollars are strung on the poles like beads in a necklace; and the number of strings of these great stone dollars possessed by a chief is the gage of his wealth and respectability.

But if utility should be a characteristic of money, a dozen grindstones piled on a pole would be of more value than the whole of it.

Fooled the Old Man.

When the young married man tells this story he makes sure that his father is not within earshot.

"I never had but one falling out with the governor," he declares. "When I went home one evening and told him that I was engaged, he cross-questioned me like a lawyer and each answer increased his wrath, till he positively forbade the bans. I have something of a temper myself, and, after a stormy interchange, we agreed upon a compromise. He did not like the girl's family. He would have it that she was a fortune-hunter. He could never approve of her under any circumstances, but if I would go abroad for two years, see other women, hold no communication with my fiancee and then return to marry her, he would interpose no obstacle. I accepted his terms.

"After I had been in Paris I met an American girl who was in all respects my ideal. She was with a wealthy aunt, whose name she had taken and whose fortune she was to inherit. I wrote the governor about her, sent him the opinion of some of my countrymen whom he knew and said his scheme had proved a good one after all. With his permission I would wed the girl in Paris.

"He cabled his permission and his approval, but in the letter that followed there was a tone of mild reproval for my inconstancy. You notice that my wife is a prime favorite with him. He never tires of singing her praises, and doesn't allow a day to go by without reminding me how he saved me from the blunder that would have spoiled my life."

"But wasn't it a little hard on the one you left behind?"

"Not at all. She's the same girl I met in Paris. But he doesn't know it, and I mean that he never shall."—Detroit Free Press.

He Deserved It.

Lippincott says that the llama of South America is one of those animals which are, in one way or another, expert marksmen. When annoyed and angry, it gives an exhibition of its wonderful skill in hitting the object which has excited its ire. The llama's weapon is its mouth. Its bullet is composed of saliva and chewed hay.

Several years ago, says the writer, at the Fair Grounds in St. Louis I witnessed an exhibition of this creature' expectorating power, in which the victim was a country beau, who came near losing his sweetheart thereby.

The young man was one of those self-sufficient individuals who imagine that knowledge sits enthroned in the temple of their own personal intellect, and that what they do not know is not worth knowing. The llama stood in the middle of its pen, fifteen feet or more away. The young man was annoying it by throwing clods of dirt at it, and tapping his cane on the rails of the pen.

I saw by the creature's actions that it was angry. The rapid movement of the jaws indicated that it was preparing for attack. I warned the young man, and told him what to expect. His sweetheart begged him to desist and to come away; but he treated by warning with derision, and told the girl that he "knew his business."

Suddenly there came a whizzing whistling noise, followed by a sharp spat. The young wiseacre lay supine upon his back, his eyes and forehead plastered with a disgusting mixture of saliva, hay and mucus.

"I hate a fool!" said the girl, as she shouldered her parasol and walked away.

I saw them again in the monkey-house, some time afterward, but the man was a changed being. He had learned his lesson in decorum.

Sharks of Old.

The modern shark is deteriorating. In ages gone by there were ferocious sharks, such as would make a mouthful of you without blinking, 70 feet in length. Plenty of their teeth have been found which are 3 inches in length, whereas the biggest of the teeth belonging to sharks that exist at the present day are 1½ inches long.

TO STOP LONDON'S GROWTH.

Sixteenth Century Laws Designed to Stop Overcrowding of Population.

It is a curious feature in the growth of London that it has always been considered to be overbuilt. As far back as 1580 it was forbidden to erect new buildings "where none had existed before in the memory of man"—the reasons given that "it was calculated to encourage the existence of the plague; create a trouble in governing such multitudes; bring about a dearth of victuals; multiplying of beggars, and an inability to relieve them; an increase of artisans more than could live together; improverishing other cities for lack of inhabitants." The decree also stated that "lack of air, arose out of too crowded a city." But it was impossible to stem the increasing tide of population. The only result was to cause overcrowding, which proved a still greater evil than overpopulation, and led up to the horrors of the plague year. Even at the beginning of this century, when London consisted of 160,000 buildings, standing in 8,000 streets, it was decided that London was overgrown and too big; and there was an outcry because the parishes had to pay £10,000 per annum to scavengers for removing ashes and refuse from the houses, whereas in former years the scavengers used to pay the parishes £25,000 for the privilege of taking away the ashes for brickmaking purposes. Those were evidently the days of the "Golden Dustman." Yet building went on, until 1873 there were 6,132 miles of streets and 528,794 inhabited houses. During the Queen's lifetime cobbled roadways have almost disappeared; cabs and omnibuses have come into vogue, railways have supplanted the stage coach; the toll gates which met Londoners at every turn have been pulled down; the Fleet prison has gone, with others which had rivaled its evil reputation; Templar bar has been removed and endless changes effected.—London Standard.

Rather Too Literally.

Instances where clerks and others—mostly new hands—put rather too literal an interpretation on instructions given to them come within the knowledge of perhaps the majority of employers. Some of these cases are by no means lacking a flavor of the ludicrous.

A rather raw youth, recently fresh from school, was one evening directed to call next day on his way to business and collect a small debt from a retail tradesman.

"It's been overdue six months. Don't come away till you get it," said his principal decisively.

Midday arrived and the youth put in no appearance at the office. The afternoon wore on, and still he was absent. Just before closing time a messenger arrived with a note from the debtor.

"Your clerk, armed with a thick stick, has been sitting in the shop since 8:30 this morning. He says he cannot leave till he gets the money. I am unable to give it to him, but I promise faithfully to pay on Saturday. Am I to lock him up with the shop or not?"

Needless to say the faithful guardian was withdrawn.

Engaging a new porter, the manager of a manufacturing firm particularly impressed upon him the need of always carrying out his orders to the letter.

Soon afterwards a customer, for whom a special article had been made, objected to the price and said he would not pay it. Threatened with a law action, however, he withdrew his protest. The article was then sent home by the new porter.

"But don't part with it unless you get the money. He's a tricky fellow," were his instructions.

At the customer's house the porter held out his hand for the money.

"Here it is," said the gentleman. "But first give me the goods."

"No," said the porter, "not till you give me the cash."

So they faced each other, wrangling for half an hour, when the porter returned to his employer with the goods, to know if, in the circumstances, he might slightly vary the procedure.

Wouldn't Take Him Long.

It is a great satisfaction for a man who possesses learning and a large amount of general information to have also a small son whose bump of curiosity is largely developed, because then the learned father has a never-ceasing opportunity to show off his knowledge.

A friend of one such gentleman—a man of science connected with many learned societies—relates an incident which occurred in his household.

This scientific gentleman was going out of his house in a hurry one day, and had his overcoat on and his hand on the door knob, when one of his boys hailed him——

"Father! before you go will you please tell me something?"

"I haven't time now?"

"Oh, it's only a little thing——"

"Won't it wait till I get home?"

"I might forget it."

"Try to remember it—that would be good practice. Good-bye."

"But it won't take a minute!"

"Are you sure?"

"Of course?"

"Well, go ahead. What is it?"

"All I want to know is, how do they work miracles? and how do they make condensed milk?"

And the small boy thought it was very unkind because his father insisted upon postponing the answers until his return home.

Did Not Miss Fire.

A Greensburg, Pa., mother while chastising her 12 year old son, the other day, exploded several packages of toy pistol caps which were concealed in the youth's hip pocket. When the smoke had cleared away she discovered that the family was out one suit of boy's clothing and had a badly lacerated youth to care for. This is another warning to mothers to make sure their sons are not loaded before applying the paddle. You are liable to find almost anything in a boy's pockets.

Believed In Either Mode.

"Why didn't they have that baptizing out at the creek the other day?"

"It rained furiously while they were on their way out, and before they got half way there the man who was going to be baptized said he was not prejudiced in favor of either mode, and he believed it wouldn't be necessary to go any further with the ceremony."—Chicago Tribune.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

THE TURN OF LIFE.

Owing to modern methods of living, not one woman in a thousand approaches this perfectly natural change without experiencing a train of very annoying and sometimes painful symptoms.

Those dreadful hot flashes, sending the blood surging to the heart until it seems ready to burst, and the faint feeling that follows, sometimes with chills, as if the heart were going to stop for good, are symptoms of a dangerous nervous trouble. The nerves are crying out for assistance. The cry should be heeded in time. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was prepared to meet the needs of woman's system at this trying period of her life.

MRS. DELLA WATSON, 524 West 5th St., Cincinnati, Ohio, says:

"I have been using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for some time during the change of life and it has been a saviour of life unto me. I can cheerfully recommend it to all women, and I know it will give permanent relief. I would be glad to relate my experience to any sufferer."

THE TALE OF A KISS.

And "Shall I kiss you?" then he asked,
And "Oh, I guess not," she replied;
For rather than have said him yes,
This maiden would have died.

For modest was this maiden fair,
And sweet, and witching, too, was she.
He might have known she would not grant
The boon he craved, oh, foolish he!

For, had he kissed her on the sly,
She'd not have more than killed him there;
And, oh, 'twere heaven to die for her,
The maiden with the nut-brown hair.

And sweetest is the stolen kiss.
Methinks the maiden had not wept,
But would have made that young man give
Her back that kiss before he slept.

And now I've told this little tale,
Ye fellows all, take heed of this:
Don't ask a maiden if you may,
But if you want to—take a kiss.
—Utica Globe.

THE HONORABLE ANNE

Ah Ging's welcome when I came, a bride, to the ranch was not of the warmest. The dusky adobe wall, throwing him into picturesque relief, he stood on the ranch house veranda, his face full of suppressed excitement.

"You telle me," he muttered, "who boss, now Mr. Allandale get mallied?"

"All same as before," was my ready rejoinder.

The crafty features relaxed and Ah Ging disappeared kitchenward, his pigtail having struck the dominant note in my first impressions of Vaquero Water.

Cedric smiled at me approvingly. "Glad you were so diplomatic, else he'd have left by the morning stage. It's awfully unromantic, but the drive has made me beastly hungry. Let's see what the old chap has for us."

We dined in a long, low room, hung with spurs and sporting prints, souvenirs of English days, the happiest couple in California.

In its lack of excitement, ranch life proved disappointing. Lynchings were unknown—bandits and desperadoes conspicuous by their absence.

So life flowed on, smoothly, monotonously, till after the birth of Billikins. Ah Ging then announced his departure. "Better girl cook," he declared. "No likee baby. Heap tlouble. Alle time cly."

The next celestial left after a hasty glance at the kitchen wall. "Me flaid," he exclaimed, pointing to a red hieroglyphic unfortunately unnoticed by us. "Ah Ging he write, 'Debbil in this house.'"

"He meant the baby," suggested Cedric.

"He say debbil. Me go. No China boy stay here. Heap scared of debbil."

"Try a girl," implored Cedric. "It's no joke driving ten miles a day to the station."

We tried, in turn: Gretchen, who left within a week to "learn religion;" Bridget, who declined working under an Englishman; the widow, whose tears, as she recounted her woes, sizzled over the stove; Dicie, who disliked low wages, though she found no fault with me; and Samantha, who objected to the lack of "scenery." Useless to point out the Brush Hills' mellow charm, distant mountains, oak-dotted meadows, Samantha remained obdurate. "It may suit you, Mrs. Allandale," she commented pityingly, "to see nothing but land. I like it like it was in Tulare. There you kin see houses as peas in a pod an' people passin' all day. That's the scenery for me, so I guess I'll pack my freight."

Which she proceeded to do, and had barely driven out of sight when a young girl, tall, slim and neatly dressed, stepped on the veranda.

"If you please, ma'am," she quietly said, "I heard that you wanted a girl. Can I have the place?"

I heard her history, which was simple. The previous year she had come from England to join her brother on a claim, had fallen ill, had gone to the county hospital at La Huerta, and had come thence to me. While hearing these details Cedric returned. But one conclusion could be drawn from his utter dejection. "No girl" was stamped on every feature. Samantha had recommended me to Odessa Green, who, less exacting in regard to scenery, was willing to leave the family pig pen for a month's charge, provided the washing was put out, Mrs. Allandale helped with the dishes, the afternoons were free and a horse every Sunday was at her disposal. I knew the type—ignorant, slatternly, familiar. Contrasting with it the new comer, my resolution was taken. "No, Cedric, I have a servant already."

"Where did she come from?"

"La Huerta, where she has been in the hospital."

"Is she pretty?"

"That is an irrelevant question. Yes, rather—blue eyes, and short, curly yellow hair."

"You know nothing about her."

"But I know that Billikins has the whooping cough. I must nurse him, and you cannot cook. Help is needed, and behold Anne."

"So that's her name."

"Yes; Anne James."

He still demurred.

"Prudence is an admirable virtue, Cedric, but you carry it to an extreme."

Cedric yielded, still holding to his own opinion. "Keep her! Keep her!" he cried; "but remember, if anything happens, be it on your head."

Since the days of Ah Ging life had not been worth living. Anne came, and comfort followed her. Capable, retiring, a vague sense of mystery pervading her, she proved in our monotonous existence a source of inexhaustible interest.

"I scent a romance," Cedric declared. "When Anne draws near find out about her."

"She is so reticent—a contrast to Samantha."

"Teach her something. Learning unlocks a woman's tongue."

So Anne was instructed in more housewifely mysteries, and grew more communicative. But Cedric received all details of her past with scornful incredulity. "Papa" was a barrister. Anne herself had been born in the sacred precincts of the Temple. Their crest figured as a dove. "Fancy one's parlor maid having a crest!" he ejaculated. For a briefless barrister he had done singularly well, marrying a niece of the celebrated Countess of Melligan. Many a torrid afternoon was whiled away with descriptions of the Irish castle where the wedding took place, the beauty of the bride, the eccentricities of the noble aunt. Cedric scoffed, still crying for more.

One languorous September day, ensconced in the veranda's shadiest nook, we gazed on the Brush hills and sighed vainly for a breeze. Cedric broke the stillness. "What about Anne? No news of late?"

"She has a sister who lives in France and is possessed of independent means."

A look of reproach shot from his dark-blue eye. "You told me that last week," he murmured.

"And did not tell you that she goes by the name of Lady Emily Brown."

"Brown! Why, she married a Frenchman."

"True."

"Why, lady? What title has he?"

"None. I particularly asked Anne."

"Absurd! He could not be 'Brown' or she 'lady' unless, indeed, the title is in her own right. In that case your pearl of a handmaiden is an 'honorable!' The Honorable Anne brings out the tray," he added, as she approached our corner. "No, it's all false, you may depend upon it. Ask McPherson what he thinks of it; he is coming up the drive."

Fergus McPherson—caution personified—opined that Anne had lied. He put it plainly: "Deceitful in speech, deceitful in deed. Better watch her, Mrs. Allandale."

My suspicions were not excited. In California nothing is impossible. Had not a scion of a lordly house died on a neighboring ranch—a lonely, neglected sheep herder? No. It was the uneasy air and restless look increasing day by day. I heartily wished for some pretext whereby Cedric, dispatched into La Huerta, might inquire into the antecedents of the Honorable Anne. Chance favored me.

"McPherson has been telling me," began my spouse, a few days later, "about some bloodhounds in town that belong to the sheriff. They are A1 at tracking criminals—borrow them all over the State. Beastly shame it's such a journey—it would be rather jolly to see them."

"Why not go? A change would do you good."

"Go! And who would milk the cow?"

"I, myself."

"You? Nonsense!"

"Who is the sheriff?" I idly asked, meditating my next move the while.

"Waite—Hiram Waite."

"Our Honorable," who had entered, bearing that ranch stand-by, a smoking bowl of "mush," started, growing visibly pale—fresh food for uneasiness. Clearly to learn the art of milking was imperative. The woman won, as usual, and Cedric, before the week was over, started for La Huerta, with strict injunctions to interview both hospital superintendent and sheriff.

In charge of the ranch were myself, Billikins, and the Honorable Anne. Uneventfully passed the first few days; but on Monday, from the veranda, I espied a band of men, who, leaving the county road, came slowly up the drive.

Anne, perceiving them, grew white to the lips, and, bearing Billikins, precipitately fled.

"Good evening," the leader began, as he lifted his sombrero. "We're kinder rough sight for a lady. You see, we're a posse over from Tulare, trying to find a man named Smith. His tracks, they seemed to p'int this way. Ain't seen any stranger round here lately?"

"No, indeed."

"No woodchopper nor nothing?"

"No, none. What has this man done? What does he look like?"

"Real nice and young and kind. Not more'n a boy. Murdered a man over there. Here's his description," and he handed me a coarsely printed "reward." "Well, boys, get a move on. We're on our way to La Huerta," he added, "to borrow Waite's dogs. Well, good day, ma'am. Better not harbor any strangers."

A moment more, and, left alone, I thought over the situation. Cedric gone, no neighbor near, a murderer at large whose steps "p'inted this way." Suddenly it was borne in upon me that Anne was the fugitive!

A firm believer in woman's intuitions, yet hoping desperately that mine was at fault, I unfolded the paper the sheriff gave me. It tallied well. Moroseness, agitation, all were explained.

Did Anne guess that her identity was known, my life, I feared, would pay the penalty. To ignore the situation, live through the night if possible, and trust to someone turning up in the morning was all that could be done.

Milking time brought fresh terrors. How guard one's self, with both hands engaged letting down floods of warm, innocent milk! Dinner was eaten hurriedly, with the same feeling of uneasiness. Billikins tucked in his crib, Anne retired early, and, every sense on the alert, I was left alone to watch the nursery door.

It fascinated me. Who would open it? Anne, to hide among the canyons till the posse had returned to its Tulare home? Or Henry Smith, to make an end of me and flee? Truly, the ranch monotony was broken at last. Solemnly the clock ticked, slowly the hands went round, an hour passed. A movement in the adjoining room, and literally my blood ran cold. That had hitherto seemed a mere figure of speech. The sound ceased, and still I watched the nursery door. At last, when my brain would have turned with more, I heard a sound which, faint at first, grew louder and louder.

"Oh, heaven," I cried, "the bloodhounds!" and fell senseless to the ground.

* * * * * * * * *

Slowly returned to consciousness, my gaze fell on Cedric, the La Huerta sheriff, and Anne—Anne anxiously applying restoratives!

"Take him away," I gasped; "he will murder us."

"You are raving!" cried Cedric; "that is Anne."

"No; Smith, the murderer. The bloodhounds tracked him to the very door."

Here Hiram Waite thought fit to interpose.

"Guess I can straighten out this kink, Mrs. Allandale. You did hear the hounds; they're up at the barn now. Your husband, he heard at La Huerta we was beatin' up this part of the country, so he lit out for home, thinkin' you'd be scared. We caught our man hidin' by the 'Dobe hill, and the Tulare boys took him back to town. Your husband and me was tired, so we made tracks for here. Sorry 'bout the dogs. Might ha' known they'd scare you."

Anne next day gave warning. "If you please, ma'am, you and Mr. Allandale have been very kind, and I love Mr. Billikins like my own, but I can't stay where I've been so misjudged."

"More candor on your part would have prevented your being misjudged."

She blushed. "I often wanted to tell you, ma'am—what I first said wasn't true. I came from England when I was a baby. I haven't any brother, and I never went to La Huerta."

"Ah!"

"The kinder you was, ma'am, the meaner I felt, and I was afraid Mr. Allandale would go to the hospital, and, worst of all, my heart stood still when he spoke of Mr. Waite. For he and my stepfather are cousins, and I was afraid he would guess who I was."

"Your stepfather?"

"Yes, ma'am; mother married Jim Waite the second time, and it was him that came with the posse and frightened me. He was such a bad, cruel man that I couldn't stand it, so I ran away."

"How did you happen to reach Vaquero Water?"

"With some friends in one of those big wagons they call 'prairie schooners.' Tulare folks go to the coast every year, but they don't go there straight; it's too much change. They always stop at the Iron springs to cool off first."

To cool off at 90 in the shade!

"So we came to the spring. I heard about you and thought I'd try for the place."

"But how much better to have told me the truth."

"I knew Mr. Allandale was English, ma'am, and they are that particular I was afraid he'd send me home."

"Surely the story of Lady Emily Brown was unnecessary."

Anne's eyes flashed. "It's every word true, ma'am. Not that I ever saw her; she was by father's first marriage, but it's true. Why, they lived in a beautiful house in St. John's Wood, and the night before they went to Paris the Prince of Wales dined with them."

"And do you believe it, my dear?" asked Cedric, on hearing the last version.

"She believes in the family traditions, but she will care less about such nonsense when she is Mrs. Hiram Waite."

"Why, she met the man only last night."

"Something will come of it, trust a woman's intuition."

"Thanks, no!" he retorted, with a cheerful grin. "No telling into what mare's nest I might be led. Never mind, darling, you did your best. We can't all be born detectives."

Cedric to the contrary, my prophecy came to pass, and our honorable Anne was transformed into Mrs. Hiram Waite. At last accounts she was well and happy, supplying the boarders at Waite's Hotel with meals at "four-bits a head." While we on the ranch are still wondering whether the Countess of Melligan and the Lady Emily Brown are myths.—San Francisco Argonaut.

The Electro-Magnet.

It is of much scientific interest and of not a little practical importance to determine the conditions resulting in the maximum attractive power of the electro-magnet. From a note extracted from the "Proceedings" of the Royal Society of London, we learn that "H. Wilde has exceeded his own estimated limit of 400 pounds per square inch for magnetic tractions by means of annealed charcoal-iron wire 0.57 inch in diameter. The electro-magnet was excited by a current of 40 amperes. With a piece of wire 1.2 inches long the unprecedented tractive force of 422 pounds per square inch was obtained. That the magnetization limit was virtually arrived at was shown from the fact that, when the current transmitted round the electro-magnet was reduced from 40 to 26 amperes, the amount of the tractive force remained constant. The determinations were made with a single-pole electro-magnet." These details are meager, but the result obtained is certainly extraordinary.—Western Electrician.

Bet's Innocence.

Bet Flint, a humble friend of Dr. Johnson, was taken up on a charge of stealing a counterpane. She was tried at the Old Bailey, and Chief Justice Willes, who had a kindness for her sex, summed up favorably, and she was acquitted. After which Bet said, with a gay and satisfied air: "Now that the counterpane is my own I shall make a petticoat of it."

FARM AND GARDEN

For Weighing Hay.

To weigh hay on barn scales, place scales, a, on the scaffold, b, over the barn floor. Across them lay a plank, c, several inches longer than the width of the scales, to which suspend a rope or chain like a swing, d, under the scales. Spread the ropes under them so they will not touch their frame. In this swing hang an iron bent like the letter S, e. To a joist, f, on one side of the scales fasten one end of a rope, passing the other end down under the scales and up to a windlass, g, on the other side of them, but first slip on this rope a hay fork pulley. To pile the hay on, make a frame, h, six feet square, light and strong enough to support 700 pounds of hay. On two sides of this frame are ropes each 14 feet long with the ends passed down through holes bored in the corners of the frame and knotted. Pile the hay on the frame, bring the ropes together over it and attach them to the pulley by another S-shaped iron. Wind up until you can hang it on the rope attached to scales, letting the weight hang on them. A ton of hay can be weighed at three draughts on 800-pound scales. I have found the above very convenient for that purpose in a barn. Deduct weight of frame.—American Agriculturist.

Combined Stackyard and Manger.

With good prices for hay, many consider good, bright oat and barley straw to be worth, for feeding purposes, quite as much as overripe clover, or timothy hay and, pound for pound, worth fully half as much as any good hay. Hence, instead of wasting the straw by building flat-topped stacks and allowing cattle and other stock to have free access to them, a yard is built around the stacks, and the straw fed out as regularly as hay or grain. A log pen has been made, as illustrated, that serves the purpose admirably. The logs rest upon a foundation of stone or wood, the lower log being 1 foot from the ground, and three logs on each side, the extreme height of fence being not less than 4½ feet. On the leeward side of the stack pen a permanent and durable manger can be easily made from small poles. This may extend the entire length of the pen, and be built upon one or more sides. The straw is thrown into it directly from the stack, and, if a ration of hay or straw be fed at noon, it will prove equally as valuable, the only objection being that it is located

That the same breed of sheep has been on the farm from one generation to another?

That line fences are not kept in good repair?

That noxious weeds are allowed to go to seed.

That the boys never get a day off for fishing?

That the orchard was not trimmed last spring?

TO CAN VEGETABLES.

How Peas, Beans and Tomatoes May Be Preserved.

The manner of preserving vegetables for winter use is now so simple that one prefers to prepare her own and have them in glass jars, these being better than the vegetables to be purchased in tin cans and less expensive, for the jars may be used a number of years with the addition of only new rubber bands.

An important item is to make sure that the jars and covers are perfectly fitting, thus being airtight. When filled they should be kept in a dark, cool place.

Green peas claim attention very soon, as the early pickings seem the sweetest and best for canning. Wash the peas and reject all imperfect ones. Fill the jar with peas, shaking them down closely and filling it to the brim. Pour over the peas cold water, letting every little space between the vegetable be filled. When no more bubbles come on the water and the jar overflows fit the covers on securely. Stand the filled jars in a boiler of water, placing them upon a wooden rack or something to prevent their coming directly into contact with the bottom of the boiler. Place the boiler over the fire and let the water boil over the jars for three hours. If the water in the jars evaporates so the jars are not full, upon no account remove the covers to fill them up; the vegetable will be best left as it is. If the cover is loosened during the process of boiling it must be screwed on as tightly as possible when taken from the water.

String beans may be treated in the same manner, except that less boiling is required for this vegetable. Cut the stem and tail from the beans and string them; then cut the beans into strips lengthwise and then in halves, or, if preferred, cut them into pieces about one inch long. Put the cut beans in the jars, filling them very full and pressing the vegetable down closely before pouring in the cold water; then proceed as with the peas, boiling the jars containing the beans a shorter time; two hours will be sufficient.

Ripe tomatoes may be canned whole and kept perfectly without the usual cooking. Drop the fruit into hot water to loosen the skin. When the peel has been removed, take out the stem end so no green remains. Pack as many of the peeled tomatoes in the jar as can be put in, having them whole if possible, though any too large may be cut into halves. Press the tomatoes as closely together as possible without breaking them. Turn over the packed fruit boiling water, pouring it in slowly, so the liquid will run into all the little crevices, and allow the jar to overflow before screwing on the fitted cover. As each jar is filled with the boiling water and covered, stand it in a tub, boiler, or some large vessel that has been filled with boiling water, having the water deep enough to completely cover the jars. When all the jars are in the water cover the vessel holding them with a rug or blanket and let it remain until the water becomes cold. As the jars are taken from the water tighten the covers if they have loosened, but upon no account lift them off. When the jars are opened to use the tomatoes the surplus water with the fruit may be drained out and not used.

This manner of preserving tomatoes whole has been well tested and without the loss of a single jar, the fruit coming out fresher and nicer than when cooked as in the former mode of canning.—New York Sun.

Doctors Want Advertising.

"Two or three years ago when the bicycle craze hit St. Louis hard there came a strange doctor to the city, who straightway got himself largely advertised by reason of his savage utterances against the wheel," said a St. Louis man.

"This medical gentleman managed to keep himself before the public for quite a while by inveighing in the city papers against the bicycle, particularly as regarded its effects on the health of women riders. He declared it to be the most injurious form of exercise a woman could take, and that if persisted in it would bring on all sorts of ailments and diseases. He wrote in good vein, and his pithy style made quite an impression among a class of conservative women who looked on the wheel with distrust and dislike anyway, and who were greatly pleased to hear it condemned from a scientific source.

"As a matter of fact, the only aim and motive this doctor had was to get his name before the public, and he succeeded so well that from being an unknown he speedily built up a fashionable and lucrative practice. Whether he believed half of what he wrote I don't pretend to say, but I am satisfied that his ulterior scheme was as I have stated.

"He was smart enough to see that his reasoning, however fallacious, would commend itself to a certain class of women, and he knew further that no other doctor of high standing would go to the trouble of contradicting his views in print. The papers were kind enough to give him a lot of free advertising, and he worked his opportunity for all it was worth."—Washington Post.

FOR THE "GREATER CITY."

Monster Sky-Scraping Tower Proposed for New York.

William J. Frye has drawn plans for a proposed tower to commemorate the consolidation of greater New York. The proposed tower, which is to be 2,140 feet in height, would be in most respects the most wonderful structure in the world. The Eiffel tower in Paris is 984 feet in height, less than half of the proposed observatory tower of New York. The tower is to be twelve-sided and built of steel. The lowest portion will be 300 feet in diameter, and will be flanked by four pavilion buildings, giving the structure a base of 400 feet. The outer walls will be of cement, having wire cloth imbedded within that material.

Internally, the tower will be a labyrinth of steel columns, girders, beams, plates, and other shapes in steel, no particle of wood being used in construction or finish, and when completed will be a white tower, absolutely fireproof. Directly in the center will rise a tube twenty feet in its outward diameter, and ten feet in its inner diameter, extending up to and in through the dome roof. The inside of the tube will be smooth, and sightseers may enter through doors on the ground floor and look up through the tube, ten feet in diameter and 2,140 feet in height. Electric cars with reserved motor power of compressed air will run spirally around the 100-foot central area, making a trip to the fifth floor from the top, about a two and a half miles' ride. From this point to the top visitors will be conveyed in an elevator. This proposed tower is to be built within the next three years, and somewhere up on the heights, where there is a firm, rocky foundation.—New York World.

A HEART OF BRICK.

Curious Method of Prolonging the Life of an Elm Tree.

One of the oldest sights of New Brunswick, N. J., is the elm tree in front of John E. Elmendorf's house, on Albany street. Mr. Elmendorf had the tree lined with brick to keep it alive.

The tree is said to be nearly 200 years old. Several years ago insects attacked it and hollowed its heart out. Then at a Fourth of July celebration a spark set fire to the dry interior and destroyed the greater part of what was left. Only the bark on one side and a little of the wood remained. At every wind the tree shook and seemed in imminent danger of falling. Mr. Elmendorf had given up all hope of saving the elm, when his wife proposed that they wall it up inside. Mr. Elmendorf set a mason at work lining the elm with brick. Fully one-half of the tree is now solid masonry, and it is in a flourishing condition. The side with the bricks faces the street, and is easily seen. It is two blocks from the Albany street bridge. The tree is known as the freak tree and the brick tree.—New York Sun.

THE BRICKS IN THE TREE.

Gladstone's Denial.

There was a report not long ago that Mr. Gladstone was learning to ride the bicycle, and its contradiction is the signal for Mr. James Payn to drop into poetry:

Mr. Gladstone denies he has taken to biking;
Nor are we surprised it was not to his liking.
Though from office and power he be a receder,
He will ne'er be a Wheeler who has been a Leader.

BEET SUGAR MATTERS.

That eventually the extensive cultivation of sugar beets in Owens Valley will be successfully entered upon we have little doubt. A late number of the Portland Oregonian has the following upon the subject:

C. F. Saylor, special agent of the Department of Agriculture, in charge of the beet sugar investigation of the United States, was in the city yesterday on his way to the experimental station at Corvalis. His home is at Des Moines, Ia., and he secured his appointment last spring from Secretary Wilson, who at one time was President of the Agricultural College from which Mr. Saylor graduted. He went to the national capital for his final instructions, and thereunder is traveling through the various States in which the sugar beet is cultivated experimentally and making a careful investigation into the conditions surrounding the industry in each State. He gave some interesting facts in connection with his work and this growing industry.

"The present Administration," said Mr. Saylor, "is aiming to foster and encourage the cultivation of beet sugar in order that eventually the volume of sugar made in this country will meet the demand of the home market and do away with the importation annually of about $100,000,000 worth of sugar. With this end in view the Department of Agriculture last spring sent tons of beet sugar seed to the experimental stations throughout the various States in the Union, and they in turn have distributed them among the farmers willing to give the industry a trial, with instructions to report on same and submit samples for analysis. The Department has been flooded with letters from all kinds of parties asking for information about the beet sugar industry, and in order to satisfactorily answer all these questions the Department has put me on the road, in order to gather data covering all practical information from the factory standpoint as well as from the growers' point of view. My work is to study all the conditions surrounding the industry in every State where it is attempted, so that when all the reports are compiled in Washington the Department will be able to demonstrate what sections can raise beet sugar profitably, and sections where soil and climatic conditions will not justify the attempt.

"I left Washington last spring and have so far studied the conditions surrounding the industry in the States of Nebraska, the two Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Colorado, Utah, Montana, Idaho and Washington. I am now going to take in Oregon, and from here I will go south to California, then to New Mexico, Texas, up to Oklahoma, then on through Missouri, Indiana, Ohio and back to Washington. My work is to establish the best sugar belt of this country, studying the conditions surrounding the growth in each district, and carefully noting same, to be embodied in my final report. The seeds sent out last spring have all been planted, and a large crop is anticipated in the various districts covered. The beets will be analyzed at the experimental station in each State nearest to the grower, and the results of that analysis will be forwarded to Washington. The Weather Bureau also plays an important part in the conditions, the meteorological features surrounding each district forming an important part of the report. Then comes the analysis of the soil, to determine its adaptability, the question of coal, lime and hundreds of other matters that are required for the satisfactory culture of the sugar beet, so that parties, farmers and capitalists desiring to start the industry can do so safely as to capital and intelligently from an agricultural standpoint.

"There are many sections in this country where factories will be started when once they know to a certainty what the costs and results will be. Beet-sugar factories are as yet limited. They have two factories in Nebraska, namely at Grand Island and at Norfolk; they have one in Utah at Lehigh; three in California, namely Alvarado, Watsonville and Chino; New Mexico has one, and that makes up the sum total of factories in this country. Two new ones are being constructed in California, one of which is Spreckels' and which will be the largest in the world. Omaha contemplates erecting a factory, while other sections in other States are anxious to start factories when told that the results of their experiments have been satisfactory. Everything so far has been most favorable to the industry, the new crop, the new tariff, and the success attending the factories in operation. All have tended to stimulate the industry, and I look for greatly increased acreage and many new factories in another year.

"The factories now in operation have been laboring under the disadvantage of working with expensive machinery, and this, I think, will be remedied in another year, for Yankee ingenuity has kept pace with this industry, as in every other in the country, and new machinery, cheaper, simpler and better adapted to do the work, is already finding its way into a number of the more progressive factories, and I expect that it will not be very long until this country will be producing sugar at a less expense than ever before, and in quantities to shut of all importation of the raw material. The report will be published by the Department for the benefit of all those interested in the industry."

The stars and stripes are likely to be the most familiar colors to be seen in Hawaiian waters in a short time from now.

PROSPECTING IN CALIFORNIA.

Acting upon the Chronicle's oft-repeated advice, throughout this State men are making an organized effort to examine the vast undeveloped mineral resources of California. There has never been a time since the fifties when so many men were actually in the field, scouring all the wild hills and ravines of the Coast Range as well as the high Sierra and the foothills, and from every quarter comes the most encouraging news of new discoveries and developments. Old placers, long since abandoned, are being worked again with modern appliances, and yielding excellent results. Old tunnels are being retimbered and pushed further into the secret recesses of the hills. Old shafts are being cleaned out, and people are realizing that, with the economic methods now in vogue, low-grade deposits may be worked with enormous profit. Even the discarded tailings of mines which have already yielded their millions to lucky owners are in many cases being worked over and again enriching the toilers.

The average Californian is convinced that a rich gold field exists in the Klondike, but the stories brought down from there about big nuggets and the fortunes taken in a day or week from rich placers has only served to revive the memory of the fortunes taken in their day from the bars of Feather river, from the waters of the Yuba and from the vast underground treasure-house of the Comstock. He has been awakened to a realization of the fact that in his zeal for agriculture and fruit-raising he has been neglecting a most important source of wealth and revenue and staid, middle-aged men who have been living for the past score of years by the most prosaic pursuits, as farmers, stock raisers, merchants, lawyers, doctors, commission men, feel stirring within their breasts the old zest for gathering riches from the shining sands or unlocking the hidden mysteries of mother earth. All of them who can be spared from their several vocations are going, a mighty host, into the mountains to work with pick and shovel next spring, and it is fair to say that few will come out again until the winter rains scatter them to their homes. Although the generality of these are animated by a hope which is almost faith that they will make a rich strike, they sensibly argue that whatever the result they will have had a jolly season's outing and a bit of enlivening adventure, at a very small cost, and will return return rehabilitated in health and spirit. There is nothing that so rejuvenates a man again as playing at being a boy, and there is no boyish sport half as enchanting as a search for treasure.

The beauty of this sort of prospecting is that it involves the minimum of expense, and is sure to yield richly in fun, sport and adventure. They know the ideal way for making such trips in California, and have an ideal climate to make them in. From the middle of April to the middle of October, and frequently, especially in Southern California, from the middle of March until Christmas, a man may travel through the wilds of our State, sleeping without shelter and enjoying perfect immunity from storm and rain. Thus relieved from the heavy impediments of the ordinary camp outfit it becomes the simplest matter in the world to pack the few necessaries of life upon a burro, and accompanying him either on horseback or on foot—the usual plan of the practical prospector—journey from one locality to another, replenishing supplies at long intervals from some small settlement. The true California miner is content to live with a spartan simplicity when in the mountains. Flour, salt, cornmeal, coffee, sugar, rice, oatmeal, beans, potatoes, onions, bacon, yeast powder and some dried fruit, with the game brought in by gun and rod, will furnish him a larder which he would not exchange for a king's. The man who imports all manner of canned delicacies, who must have condensed milk to wash down his coffee, and requires condensed eggs, oysters, anchovies, stuffed olives, tea and chocolate or canned mincemeat to vary the bill of fare, is reviled and ostracised by every true mountaineer. The man who goes into the wilderness with an honest purpose does not expect Delmonico fare, and begrudges every waste hour spent over the camp fire. Simple, hearty meals, seasoned by the appetite born of vigorous exercise and prepared with the least possible ceremony, are the rule of the practical prospector. If there be a chance to add to them a little occasional fresh "garden truck" or fruit from some isolated orchard he will welcome the opportunity. But he will not go a mile out of his way to find it. Prospecting the geological formation of a rugged and trailless district is not child's play, and the man who expects to do it with any satisfaction to himself must bend all his energies to it.

It is estimated that the man or party of men who travel in this manner, taking but a single pack animal a piece and wasting nothing upon the superfluities of life, can fare well upon twelve dollars worth of provisions per capita. Indeed, a physician and his wife, accustomed to all the comforts of life to be obtained from the strength of a bountiful income, who last year spent ten months traveling in their own wheeled road car through Southern California, provided with oil stoves and every obtainable luxury that they craved, found that their united expenses only slightly exceeded twenty dollars a month! But while they were able to command a greater variety of food and did not in any way stint themselves as to expense, they would not require the quantity demanded by hearty men traveling afoot.

The appeal in the case of murderer Durrant will be argued in the United States Supreme Court at Washington on the 18th inst. The effect will be to determine whether or not California has a legal right to hang any one having money or influence.

Dr. H. Campbell, a distinguished English scientist, has written an essay in which he deals with the physiological effect of laughter. He says that it is an exercise, and a good one. When we laugh we increase the play of the tension in our lungs. One result of this increased tension is to arrest the blood flow into the lungs and to induce the taking of deep inspirations. These latter are healthful things, for many parts of our lungs are called into active use in ordinary breathing. The apex, or top of the lung, is notably a part which does not actively participate in the movements of the breathing, and as this is the special seat of the consumption attack, we may reasonably hold that the law of disuse explains the greater liability of this portion of the organ to the onset of disease. The free and active use of a part, strengthening and toning it, as it were, is an essential condition for health. Hence laughter, by bringing into play the whole of the lungs, or at least by favoring an increase of lung work, is to be reckoned an admirable exercise. These movements which have for their object the bringing into play of the whole of the lung cells are rightfully regarded as of great importance in developing a healthy chest. Laughter seems, therefore, to be an admirable adjunct to such expedients.

If Southern California is to share in the benefit to be derived by the deliberations of the California Miners' Association, it is time that county organizations were effected and live delegates appointed. It will be useless to call meetings, as was done last year, and appoint a large list and have no representative there. The editor of this journal has been the sole delegate from Southern California for several years, and, while the honor is appreciated, it is time the counties in Southern California gave substantial proof of their interest in the association, and sent a good delegation from every camp in Southern California. It is one of the best ways to allow the outside world to know that mines exist in Southern California. The seven counties contain thirty-eight and one-half per cent of the entire area of the State, and certainly need more advertising than the northern counties, where good-paying mines have been in operation for the last 45 years. County organizations are once more urged to help in every possible way, both by sending delegates and appropriating funds to carry on the work which has been so ably begun by the northern counties. The Journal will send any desired information regarding the convention.—Los Angeles Mining and Metallurgical Journal.

It will surprise many to learn that the corn crop of the United States, even in this year of one dollar wheat, is of much greater value than the wheat crop. Yet this is the case, according to the New York World, which estimates the value this year of six products—wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye and cotton—at $1,861,000,000. Of this, corn heads the list, the value of the produce being estimated at $620,000,000. Wheat comes second with $550,000,000, and cotton third with $320,000,000.

Justice Field is not alone in remaining upon the Supreme Bench beyond the time when he might naturally be expected to retire. A current item says that seventy Judges of the English Supreme Court continue on the bench, although they have passed tha period at which they are by law entitled to retire on a pension. It would appear that the United States is not the only country where "few office holders die and none resign."

The proceedings in America connected with the case of Butler, the murderer, occupied 117 days' time and cost $28,000. His trial in Australia occupied two days and a half, and the hanging half an hour.

Croup Quickly Cured.

MOUNTAIN GLEN, Ark.—Our children were suffering with croup when we received a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It afforded almost instant relief. This celebrated remedy is for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

Tuba Canyon has fifty tons of ore ready for shipment to the new mill.

Some men have queer ideas of the English language and mix it up until the meaning is absurdly twisted. We have received a note from an Anteloper, in which the following occurs: "I am cooking here. Got a good job, and want to learn how to calve. Can you tell me how to learn?" What can we do more than to advise him to consult some experienced cow?

A few weeks ago the editor was taken with a very severe cold that caused him to be in a most miserable condition. It was undoubtedly a bad case of la grippe and recognizing it as dangerous he took immediate steps to bring about a speedy cure. From the advertisement of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the many good recommendations included therein, we concluded to make a first trial of the medicine. To say that it was satisfactory in its results, is putting it very mildly, indeed. It acted like magic and the result was a speedy and permanent cure. We have no hesitancy in recommending this excellent Cough Remedy to anyone afflicted with a cough or cold in any form.—The Banner of Liberty, Libertytown, Maryland. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

It is a well-established fact that copper held in solution in water can be easily obtained by using iron as a precipitant, but as the precipitation of copper in solution with iron is comparatively slow and in many instances costly, a more active and less expensive precipitant was much in demand. Thos. Wren, of Reno, has made the question a study, and, after repeated and numerous experiments with different substances, has discovered that copper in solution with water can be readily thrown down with alkali. Alkali will precipitate the copper at once, while iron requires from twenty-four hours to several months—depending upon the amount of iron used.

AN ABOMINABLE LEGACY.

A tendency to rheumatism is undoubtedly inherited. Unlike many other legacies, it remains in the family. The most effectual means of checking this tendency, or of removing incipient rheumatism, whether preexistent in the blood or not, is to resort to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters as soon as the premonitory twinges are felt. Nullifying the influences of cold, exposure and fatigue, the Bitters not only fortifies the system against their hurtful consequences, but subjugates malaria, liver and kidney complaint, dyspepsia and nerve disquietude.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

SILK FROM THE SPRUCE.

Pulp Fiber Is Found to Make a Very Good Substitute.

Silk of excellent quality is being made from the spruce tree in Europe, and a movement is on foot to establish the industry in this country. It is said that the cost of making silk by this process is one-fifth that of the spinning from the silkworm cocoon. The fiber takes dye as readily as the animal product and can be woven as securely and as rapidly. It is also claimed that the tensile strength of the fabric is as great, as if not greater than, the real silk.

Although the spruce lends itself to the process better than most woods, other forms of pulp can be used, the inventor even declaring that old newspapers, after they have been cleaned of the printer's ink, may be readily made into silk. The inventor, who has made the subject a study for 20 years, based his experimental work on the fact that the silkworm, in eating and assimilating the leaf of the mulberry tree, obtained the foundation of the silk from vegetable fiber. In trying to hit upon the particular chemical process that the original fiber went through before it was spun as silk by the loom he found that after the fiber had been separated it needed the chemical action of a certain form of glucose. In the new treatment the tree is crushed, and the resulting fiber is mixed with glucose and then placed in deep metal tubs. A disk, somewhat like a steam piston, is then forced down on the mass by hydraulic pressure until it is compressed into a very heavy gum. At the bottom of the tubs are tubes terminating in tiny glass nipples, with exceedingly small apertures. Under the hydraulic pressure the mixture is forced out of these glass nipples in silklike fibers, which are so fine that the girls who are employed in this portion of the process are obliged to wear highly magnifying glasses in order to see when any of the fibers break. The material is then carried over electrically heated drums, which dry the ether and the alcohol out of it. It is then plunged into iced water, dried and spooled for the looms. —Buffalo Express.

Fresh Figs For Northern Markets.

Fresh figs are not known or appreciated in northern markets, and consequently the demand is too limited to encourage shipments. It seems doubtful if the distant shipment of fresh figs will ever become a profitable business. The fruit is more perishable than any other that is generally marketed. It can be handled only by the most careful and experienced persons, and even then it is not in a condition to show its best quality. Ripening in midsummer, when the northern markets are crowded with many well known fruits and not being especially attractive to the eye, fresh figs would at best gain favor slowly.

The fact that many people do not care for them at the first would be another obstacle in the way of their popularity. Moreover, the fig is a tedious crop to handle when in proper condition for the market. It is necessary to pick the trees over carefully every day during the season or much fruit will be overripe. With large trees this involves much labor. The acrid juice of the immature fig eats into the fingers of the pickers and packers, while rainy weather occasions heavy loss by the cracking of the fruit, which renders it unfit for market.—Southern States.

Home Duties of Indian Children.

There are home duties as well as pleasures for the children. Boys are required to look after the ponies, to lend a hand in planting, to help in the harvest, and they are often made to do active duty as scarecrows in the newly planted field, where, like little Bopeep, they fall fast asleep. The girls help to gather wood, bring water and look after the younger ones. As they grow older they are taught to cut, sew and make garments. In former days, the old Omaha says, no girl was considered marriageable until she had learned to tan skins, make tents and clothing, prepare meat for drying and could cultivate corn and beans, while a young man who had not learned to make his own weapons and to be a skillful hunter was not considered fitted to take upon himself the responsibilities of the provider of a family.—"Home Life Among the Indians," by Alice C. Fletcher, in Century.

Precautionary Measure.

Patient—Isn't it a little dangerous to administer anaesthetics? Must be terrible to have one die in your chair after you have given him ether.

Life, to be worthy of a rational being, must be always in progression. We must always purpose to do more or better than in time past.—Johnson.

A GIANT PUMPING PLANT.

Packer's Great Irrigation Enterprise a Success.

Hundreds of Acres of Wheat Land Along the Sacramento River Supplied With Water.

Pumping plants have been so improved in the last few years as to lead one to hope that in that direction lies the solution of the irrigation question. George F. Packer, although considered one of the most conservative men in the county, has led off in a number of things. Some years ago he checked off some land and put in a flume for winter irrigation and planted alfalfa. He made a survey himself to determine the practicability of taking the water out of the river below Stony creek to water the river lands, and wanted the co-operation of some of the farmers to build the canal. He opposed both the Colusa and the Central districts because he did not believe in that plan—and time has shown that he was wiser in that than many of us. He wanted to know who was to manage.

Again he comes to the front. The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco has just completed, on his home place, the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence, which will be used for pumping water from the river with which to irrigate several hundred acres of land.

This plant consists of an 80-horse power, horizontal single cylinder, Hercules engine and a Krogh Manufacturing Company's 15-inch centrifugal pump, guaranteed to raise six thousand gallons of water per minute twenty-seven feet high. There is also a smaller pump of four hundred gallons a minute capacity driven by the same engine. This is for tank purposes.

The engine is arranged to use either gasoline or distillate oil, and as the latter is very cheap it will no doubt be the fuel selected for use. The 20-inch suction pipe, made of No. 10 steel, passes through the levee, on an incline, into the river, and at its lower end is a large foot valve weighing twelve hundred pounds.

A 20-inch discharge pipe carries the water from the pump to a head box twenty-two feet square and six feet high. For the foundation of the machinery an excavation was made and filled with concrete. The first test made showed a much larger pumping capacity than the contract called for, the flow of water exceeding seventy-two hundred gallons a minute. Seventy-two hundred gallons a minute are four hundred and thirty-two thousand gallons an hour, or ten million three hundred and sixty-eight thousand gallons per day of twenty-four hours—enough water to cover three hundred and eighty-four acres an inch deep, or thirty-eight acres ten inches deep every day of twenty-four hours.

A very important part is the exceedingly small cost of the fuel, it being only one-eighth gallon per hour for each horse power actually used, and the price of the fuel is less than ten cents a gallon. If the whole force should be used, there would be only eight gallons an hour, or less than two hundred gallons a day of twenty-four hours. The fuel item then is less than twenty dollars for covering thirty-eight acres, ten inches deep with water—or less than sixty cents an acre. If used for wheat, one sack to the acre will pay all the expenses of putting ten inches of water on it just as it is wanted most.

This pumping plant, destined to revolutionize agriculture in the Sacramento valley, was put in operation Friday, August 6th.

Early in the morning a party of Colusans drove to the ranch of Mr. Packer, which is on the river below Princeton, to see the great pump make a trial of its strength. The air was cool and the drive most pleasant, though dusty. Arriving, they found the engine placed in a concrete oblong, square basin, sloping towards the cut in the levee that leads to the river and the great twenty-eight inch iron pipe extending from a 22x22 foot reservoir down the concrete basin, on through the cut in the levee and river bank into the water. The machinery was all clean and bright and G. W. Tibbetts and Arthur Pope were on hand to put it in motion. John E. Doak of San Francisco having the work in charge, was there, and as the engine started, the great belts moving slowly at first, and increasing in velocity, the water began to come with force into the reservoir. It gushed for awhile, when one of the smaller parts of the engine became clogged, and it was stopped for arrangement. Just then, as all stood still, there was a splash and a wild shout came from those who had climbed upon the edge of the reservoir. All rushed up and found Mr. Stice of Red Bluff, who is here buying fruit, floundering around in the water, having lost his balance and tumbled in. There was much merriment at his expense and it had a healthy action on the crowd, bringing laughter and good will all around.

Again, the engines started, and forcing seventy-two hundred gallons to the minute, the great reservoir was soon overflowing and all pronounced it the grandest of successes.

The success of Mr. Packer's enterprise will show conclusively that it will be immensely profitable to irrigate even wheat lands that are at all favorably situated. Who would not give a sack of wheat an acre for the privilege of ten inches of water at will? It would make a difference, one year with another, of five to ten sacks; there need be no summer-fallowing. A certain crop every year. But then there comes in a more profitable crop—alfalfa and sugar beets.

This plant was put in for Mr. Packer for $3,500, but the head of the company informs us that this was an inducement and that another would come higher.—Colusa Sun, August 6, 1897.

BLOOD WON.

Fair Anna Was a Deacon's Niece, but She Enjoyed the Race.

One of these men who came in from the country and has climbed from the bottom of the ladder to the top likes to tell a story on his wife, whose second beauty is crowned by a mass of silken hair as white as cotton.

"We both lived on a farm then," he says. "Anna was an orphan and brought up by a strict old uncle, who was a deacon. She was pretty and bright, but so prim and straitlaced that she would sanction nothing to which the deacon himself objected, and no old Covenanter ever drew the lines more closely than he did.

"Next to Anna my affections were centered on a colt that was good to look at and developed a wonderful speed and gameness that spoke of aristocratic descent. I told this to no one but Anna, and it was with great difficulty that I induced her to ride one Sunday with me to a camp meeting behind a real trotter.

"Going to the meeting I regulated the colt's pace to suit the day and the occasion, and he was as sedate as the deacon himself. The only girl of the neighborhood who pretended to rival Anna in beauty was there with a young fellow who prided himself on having the fastest horses in the county. Toward sundown she told Anna that we had better start home early. They would require much less time and would probably pass us on the way. That made me mad and I thought I detected an unwonted fire in her eyes. We were jogging homeward as decorously as we had gone, talking solemnly as we should, when there was a rush past us, a cloud of dust and a mocking laugh that bade us 'goodby.' My colt was prancing and pulling like a tugboat. I was bound to please my girl, grinding as it was.

"'Let 'er go!' came between her red lips and white set teeth just as a girl of the period would say 'Let 'er go, Gallagher.'

"That was enough. Fences and trees flew the other way. Blood told, and the colt seemed on wings. When we were nose and nose, Anna was so excited that she wanted to take the reins for fear I couldn't win the Sunday race. But the gallant colt shot us through ahead. It wasn't long till Anna wore a little jewelry and tolerated cards to the extent of playing 'old maid.'"—St. Louis Republic.

WINDFALLS FOR GAMINS.

Two Lavish Gifts Bestowed on a Pair of Bright Boys.

Quite recently the pretty wife of a prosperous manufacturer was looking into a confectioner's window when a barefooted lad of about 10 coolly walked up to her and placed his rugged arm through hers.

"Excoose this liberty, mum," he said, with comical ceremony, "but I ain't got a mother o' my own, an I feels lonely. Will ye kiss me?"

For a moment the lady was too astonished to speak, but the sight of the dirty face turned so audaciously up to hers drove away her indignation. Much to the amusement of the passers-by she kissed the lad soundly, asked him where he lived and dismissed him with a few coppers. But that was not the end of the little incident, for some weeks after the boy was hunted up by the lady's husband and presented with £100—"payment for the kiss taken in front of the confectioner's window," the lady said.

A good natured gentleman who is very stout, and on that account does not care to stoop, once dropped his brier pipe in the middle of a busy street. The pipe was a great favorite of his, but he dared not run the risk of bending down, and after gazing regretfully at his fallen treasure he decided to abandon it. Before he could do so, however, a little street arab saw his plight, and, running forward, picked up the pipe and restored it to him.

The gentleman stared at the boy without speaking for awhile, and then pulled a handful of gold out of his pocket.

"Take this, kiddie, and be careful how you spend it," he said. "Mind also that whatever you do with it you are not to spend it on butter scotch, for that's the stuff that made me fat."

He then walked away, leaving the astonished urchin in possession of a windfall amounting to over £30.—London Telegraph.

"LEAVE TO PRINT.

Speeches in the Congressional Record Which Were Never Delivered.

The greater part of the contents of the Congressional Record these days, says the New York Sun, is composed of belated revisions of remarks made in the House while the Dingley tariff bill was under discussion, or post-mortem observation on the general subject of the bill, which are printed by authority of the House contained in the special order adopted for regulating the consideration of the measure in the House. It provided that for twenty days subsequent to the final vote on the passage of the bill members might print in the Record extensions of remarks made in the debate, or, if they so desired, speeches, no part of which had been delivered. This practice of granting "leave to print" has come down to the present from the mists of antiquity, as it were, and no one knows its origin. It is and has been grossly abused, and at times has been the occasion of animated discussions in the House as to the right of a member to insert remarks he never made in the House.

Representative Wheeler of Alabama holds the record for expansion, under "leave to print." Getting the floor for a single minute on one occasion, members were astonished to see in the Record the next morning that in that minute he had delivered himself of about four pages of the Record, a space which ordinarily covers an hour to an hour and a half of the proceedings. Dr. Hunter, a member from Illinois, whose speech on the tariff bill appeared recently, seems likely to give the genial Alabamian a close brush for first place. His post-mortem effort covers twenty-five pages of the Record, and is believed to be an unequaled performance in its line.

The withholding of speeches for revision, a practice also sanctioned by hoary-headed precedent, is subject to criticism. There is apparently no rule regulating the matter, and the consequence is that the Record occasionally fails to fully record the proceedings. A member on one occasion made a speech, the newspaper report of which formed the basis of an attack by his opponent in the next campaign. The Congressman denied having uttered the remarks attributed to him, and appealed to the Record to sustain him. The challenge was eagerly accepted by his rival, who, not being up to all the tricks of Congressmen, was covered with confusion at his failure to find the alleged speech. The member had simply "withheld his remarks for revision," and then calmly pocketed them.

In the old days of the Congressional Globe the reporters of debates were the victims of this practice. Among the traditions at the Capitol is one in which the late Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, at one time Speaker, was the chief actor. The story goes that at one stage of his career Mr. Banks was a pupil of a teacher of elocution in Washington, and he sought every opportunity on the floor of the House to practice the art. Many of these speeches, evidently, he did not care to embalm for posterity in the enduring record of the House proceedings. After having concluded he would ask the reporter to withhold the manuscript from the printer and give it to him for revision. These speeches, it is related, he never returned, and subsequently a chestful or two were found in his room. In those days the Globe reporters were paid $4 a column for their work as it appeared in print, and it cost them about $1 of this to transcribe their notes. So it may easily be imagined that that part of the tradition is true which avers that whenever Mr. Banks rose to speak a groan traversed the reporters' bench.

Dual Southern City.

"My residence in Texarkana is on the Arkansas side of the town," said B. M. Foreman, recently appointed postmaster of that city, in conversation the other day. "The line that separates Texas from Arkansas runs through the middle of the town, and the total population, approximately 15,000, is about evenly divided by the boundary mark. There are two mayors, of course, and two distinct city governments, but the dual situation works without the least hitch or friction. If a man on the Texas side breaks a State law and crosses over on Arkansas soil, he is arrested by the officers there and held until a requisition can be had from the State authorities, and vice versa. In the great majority of cases the man arrested will go back without troubling the officers to get a requisition. Our city is in a thriving condition and does an immense lumber business. In Texarkana and its neighborhood are some of the largest sawmills in the country. The construction of the Port Arthur road—the line from Kansas City to the gulf—has been of immense benefit to us."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Inferior Sponges in Demand.

There is a scarcity in Florida waters of the best sponge, the "sheepwool," and the returns to the sponge fishers have been gradually lessening. A like scarcity in other waters is indicated by the increased demand for inferior sponges, which have heretofore been looked upon as comparatively worthless. One of these, the grass sponge, is very abundant in Florida. It is of coarse texture and has large internal channels, but has proved to be a fair substitute for the better sponge. A demand for it, both in this country and in Europe, has resulted in raising its price to the fisher from 28 cents to 65 cents a bunch. Its gathering is profitable at 50 cents a bunch, and the demand for it has infused new life into a Florida industry which has been languishing for seven years.

He Escaped.

A bishop of the Methodist Church was preaching a sermon on the vanity of dress, and incidentally alluded to people who wore velvet and gold ornaments.

After the sermon a distinguished member of his conference approached him and said: "Now, bishop, I know you were striking at me, for I have a velvet vest and a heavy watch chain."

The bishop smiled, passed his hand over the vest, touched the chain, and then said, with a merry twinkle in his eye: "No, really, Brother B., for the vest you wear is only a cotton velvet, and I am half persuaded that your watch chain is brass."—Atlanta Constitution.

Most persons think their "trade" is so valuable that merchants would fail should they patronize other stores.

GRANT AS A PEACEMAKER.

Settled With Infinite Tact Feuds Which Arose Among His Officers.

After the capture of Vicksburg Logan chose a prominent and beautiful residence for his headquarters, and General McPherson chose the same, and a quarrel threatened to involve divisions and corps and gave the superior officers great concern, according to the Chicago Inter Ocean. Both McPherson and Logan carried the case to General Grant. He heard the schemes of each, and his staff officers looked with dismay at his quiet, bashful way of listening.

After hearing both sides General Grant turned to Logan with a smile and said he was sorry that the general had placed his heart on any headquarters in Vicksburg, because he had just written an order sending the whole division on a special expedition to look after the retreating rebels. Logan glowered until Grant, turning to McPherson, said: "I am sorry to disarrange your plans, general, but I have just written an order sending your division on an important expedition. I appreciate the feelings of the men who would like to march through Vicksburg, but it will be impossible. Duty comes first." General Logan's face cleared and McPherson smiled. Each went to his command and there was no further trouble. They possibly suspected that Grant had invented the expeditions to get rid of the quarrel, but they recognized the fine strategy of his maneuver, the fairness of his decision.

The Sacredness of Prayer Rugs.

Verses from the Koran and other passages considered sacred are generally stamped on the fabrics used as prayer rugs by the Mohammedans, and it is criminal in oriental law to export such pieces. This is doubtless because use by the occidentals means the treading of the sacred words under infidel feet, and when you think it over it is not to be wondered at. A few years ago an American succeeded in getting two such pieces as near home as Paris, but the inducements offered to him to return them to the oriental dealer were potent enough to effect their purpose.

MOTHERHOOD.

Mrs. Pinkham Declares No Woman Need Despair.

There are many curable causes for sterility in women. One of the most common is general debility, accompanied by a peculiar condition of the blood.

Write freely and fully to Mrs. Pinkham. Her address is Lynn, Mass. She will tell you, free of charge, the cause of your trouble and what course to take. Believe me, under right conditions, you have a fair chance to become the joyful mother of children. Mrs. Lucy Lytle, 255 Henderson St., Jersey City, N. J., certainly thinks so. She says:

"I am more than proud of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and cannot find words to express the good it has done me. I was troubled very badly with the leucorrhœa and severe womb pains. From the time I was married, in 1882, until last year, I was under the doctor's care. We had no children. I have had nearly every doctor in Jersey City, and have been to Belvin Hospital, but all to no avail. I saw Mrs. Pinkham's advertisement in the paper, and have used five bottles of her medicine. It has done more for me than all the doctors I ever had. It has stopped my pains, and has brought me a fine little girl. I have been well ever since my baby was born. I heartily recommend Mrs. Pinkham's medicine to all women suffering from sterility."

MANY of those who flock to the seashore, to the mountains and to Europe each year during the hot months of summer, are not purely health seekers or fashionable folk. It seems as if in every community, city or urban, there are countless thousands who have enough gypsy blood in their veins to feel a longing when the first warm days come on, to get away into the woods and fields, away "into the heart of the hills," to breathe the fresh air untainted. There are many to whom such a vacation means rest from nerve strain and toil that has become distasteful, whose pocketbooks will not suffice for summer hotels and fine wardrobes. And there is many a man—yes, and many a woman—who, used to all the refinements of life, looks back upon days of primitive freedom spent under a roof of canvas as among the happiest ever known. One never forgets such resting times, and before the tan is off the face, or the nerves again acknowledge business influence, the heart is longing for another privilege of living as the birds live.

Vacation during the past ten years has come to mean much, both in city and country, with the busy denizen of the metropolis as with the resident of the average country village, and the isolated farmer, as well, the keynote of longing is rest and change. All crave the beneficent boon, all appreciate it. It is a delightful break in a monotony that otherwise would seem vapid and unendurable. It is not enough for the city resident to visit the brightest of parks, for the country resident to wander in home forests. Other parks and other forests must fill the eye. A break, a change, travel, new society, new scenes, must intervene, if it is only for a brief fortnight, and the spirit returns to its cares and labors rejuvenated and ardent for the work beyond.

With a great majority of people, "camping out" is the most delightful of summer experiences, and from the first warm days till the time when the frost falls the mere mention of rod or reel or rifle sets the sportsman's blood a-tingle. In his fancy he can catch the odor of the pine woods on a bright, crisp morning; he can hear the loons on the lake, and the solitary screech of a night owl; he can see the "shiners" glisten in the sun, and hear the cool splash as they go down to tempt the gamy bass.

The best time for camping, some say, is in June; it is in July and August and September and October, according to other good authorities. The fact is, it all depends on what you are going for and where you are going. If you are after big game, fall is the ideal season. That's when a crack of the rifle in steady hands brings down a deer. That's when, lying flat down in the grass which a hoar frost or two has bleached to the color of his dead-grass colored corduroys, the sportsman creeps up with bated breath, when whir, whir, zip! and down comes a duck or a fluttering partridge. And the forest is a dream of beauty. But the hot summer days tempt many a veteran camper to fly from business long before autumn. "Fish?" remarks one, "I tell you it's always cool enough to fish. It's never hot when you row out in midstream, cast your line and wait for the tug."

The novice in camping is sure to burden himself with cumbersome superfluities, while he is likely to omit indispensable requisites. But with a proper tent, a small oil stove, blankets, lanterns, dishes, campstools, and a couple of packing boxes, the primitive becomes the luxurious. One who has never been camping would be surprised to see the variety of temping dishes that can be prepared over a campfire. With proper provision, there is no reason why the bill of fare should not include the perfection of the best table, only that the beefsteak broiled on the coals, and the brook trout just fresh from the brook, cannot be duplicated outside of a camp fire environment. There are, of course, vexatious moments, when the novice makes a sad jumble of the eggs, or the cook of the day is shut out from congenial pleasures temporarily, but this is made up for when the camper proudly dresses his first 10-pounder, or brings in a brace of birds just plump enough to be luscious and tender.

"NO SUMMER HOTEL FOR ME."

Of late years this camping out idea his taken magical hold of church choirs, classmates, secret and temperance societies, and large parties of mutual acquaintances.

As many as 100 members of a lodge, for instance, plan for a two weeks camping out. A committee of arrangements takes charge of all details. The camping site is generally near some popular summer resort, where there is a lake, woods, hotels and ready transportation. This little city enjoys itself thoroughly. The merry crowd takes storms as novel experiences, mishaps as something to talk about when home is reached. The idea is a growing one, and has been reduced to the minimum, so far as expense is concerned.

Vacation to some, however, either means a long visit to some relatives at a distance, and amid strongly contrasting surroundings, or a tour of the fashionable or lively summer resorts. There is not much of rest for the bright-spirited person in such a course. Pleasure is the ruling influence—boating by day, picnics, driving, tennis; a dance every night, and meals up to the menu of a three-dollar a day city hotel. The experience is an expensive one, for everything costs. The roving, unsatisfied element invariably appears in the professional tourist. Summer vacation means change of air and change of scene, and there are many folks who are continually changing their summer resort. To have sojourned last year at Long Branch means a month in the White Mountains this season, or a summer at Newport this year indicates a residence at Saratoga Springs next season. We Americans are the most restless, changing, unsatisfied people on earth.

There is a certain class of city people, however, who cling to their favorite mountain or lake, the kind of people who do not like the roaring sea and the board walk. They want quiet, mountain air and scenery always. So it appears that, after all, Saratoga Springs, Lake Chautauqua, the Thousand Islands, the Catskill Mountains, Lake George, the Adirondack Mountains and the New England coast have their regular visitors, and they are among the people with whom going to the country is almost as easy as it is for those more fortunate ones who have their own country homes. There is another smaller class of summer tourists who go to Europe for their outing. The hard times, the higher steamship rates, the advancing prices for living in England and on the continent and the desire for retrenchment have reduced th' class considerably, and many people who once belonged to that body have sought country homes for the season.

Niagara Falls, celebrated as Nature's wonder throughout the entire universe, has a large number of summer visitors. The big hotels there on both the American and the Canadian sides of the Niagara River are crowded with guests, many of them from foreign countries. There are many points of interest about Niagara City, and the big falls are not alone the attraction.

Not many miles distant is the far-famed Lake Chautauqua, one of the most magnificent bodies of resh water in the world. The lake is some twenty-six miles long and from two to six miles wide. Steamboats ply its waters, and there are big hotels at each of the dozen landings along the shore. It is an ideal summer resort and a decided favorite among people residing in Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Cleveland and the South and West.

Then there is Echo Lake, in the Adirondacks, Lake George, Delaware Water Gap, Mount Washington, and innumerable places where profound enjoyment has been reduced to a science. There are the Thousand Islands, free to all visitors, and camping parties and excursionists may locate where they will on promise not to commit needless depredation. In a prettily shaded rock in a pleasant cove a student can pitch an "A" tent and spend the summer vacation in the midst of the life and beauty of the river at less expense than he could have boarded in the dullest of country towns.

WHITE MOUNTAIN COACHING PARADE.

ON LAKE CHAUTAUQUA.

Of the Western resorts and midsummer attractions for the tourist and recreation seekers none can compare with the great lakes, and more particularly the shores of Lake Superior. It is an outing in itself to but ride along the shores of this famous lake. For hours one can ride along the shore, whose irregularities provide a wide diversity of scenery in woods, among rocks and every few minutes close beside the closed ends of the great bays which spread out into an ocean-like endlessness of water.

A LAKESIDE NYMPH.

There are many points of interest to be found in a voyage of the lakes, differing from those found anywhere else in this country. There are the celebrated pictured rocks, the Indian tribes of the North, the famous copper mines and scenery unsurpassed.

People residing in Chicago, St. Paul and other cities, and in the country contiguous, resort every summer to hotel and cottage life at Delavan and Waukesha, at Lauderdale Lake, Benton Harbor, Mount Clemens and Put-in-Bay Island. All along the great lakes are scattered beautiful places of resort, and some have economical features that give the slim pocket-book a fair chance.

The person who gets the most good out of his few weeks of summer vacation does not own a cottage at any resort. He goes to a different place each year, never makes the same trip twice. It is the most tiresome thing in the world to be obliged to go to the same cottage, and have the same neighbors, and do the same things, and dress in the same fashionable sort of clothes that you do all the rest of the year. After such a season one feels as if he must now take a rest elsewhere, and he needs it far more than he did at the beginning of summer.

Don't go where you will meet any one you know if you can help it. Don't go to the same place you have gone, perhaps, for years. Go to some new place not a fashionable resort, but one which is comparatively new to everybody, some wild place where civilization has not ruined the natural beauty of the scenery. Get near to "Nature's heart" and stay there. Fill your days with out of door pleasures. Lie on the pine needles somewhere in the North woods and take in all the good, clear, sweet breath of the woods and study by observation everything or anything in Nature. Dream—dream all day long, and sleep and eat. It will not be necessary to lay any command down to eat, for any one who spends his time in the woods by the lakes cannot help but eat. The appetites of sojourners in those regions are something astounding.

Above all, don't hurry. Whatever you do take your time. This is a time of general relaxation and should not be utterly spoiled by trying to crowd too much pleasure into a short time. Take all you can leisurely and conveniently and leave the rest for another season.

A couple of stanzas by Dr. Van Dyke just expresses the true idea of a vacation:

Only an idle little stream,
Whose somber waters softly gleam,
Where I may wade, through woodland shade,
And cast the fly and loaf and dream.

Only a trout or two, to dart
From foaming pools and try my art.
No more I'm wishing, old fashioned fishing
And just a day on nature's heart.

THE QUESTION OF THE VACATION SEASON—WHERE TO GO?

PIGEON FAMILY ON A SHIP.

Female Made Her Mate Sit on the Eggs During the Voyage.

On board the Neptune liner Delano, Captain James, which arrived recently from Rotterdam, is a clear case of petticoat government.

When the Delano left Rotterdam a pair of pigeons were occupying a loft on the vessel. On the voyage across the Atlantic two eggs appeared in the nest, over which there was a real pigeon chuckle that drew the attention of the crew, and investigation proved that a family was expected. Great care was taken by the sailors in wild weather to see that the mother and her eggs were not rolled out or washed by the seas.

Then the sailors discovered that there was more petticoat government visible in the treatment of the male by the female than was recognized in the ethics of the married men who were on board. As an instance it was seen that after the mother had taken a "dog watch," keeping the eggs warm, she would catch her better half by the collar and drag him into the nest and make him take her place on the eggs. No sailor would stand such treatment as that without complaining to the British Consul or the Board of Trade. The male pigeon performed his duties without a murmur and the eggs in the nest promise to yield a sea crop of pigeons.

Again the female dragged the male into the nest and made him take his place on the eggs. Then she stood outside the nest and spruced her plumage, which she had disregarded at sea. Then looking several times into the home and seeing that everything was all right she raised her wings and flew away. At tea time she had not returned and Captain James is bothering his head as to what he will do with the orphans if the father follows the mother. He hopes that Immigrant Commissioner Robinson will not put him under the same bond that he does when stowaways escape from ships.—Baltimore Sun.

Dangers of Smoking.

While many surgeons deny the existence of "smokers' cancer," others indicate tobacco as the cause of cancer of the lips and nasal fossae. The disease from this cause is said to be lobulated epithelioma, sometimes of horny tissue. It shows particularly among smokers who pay no attention to the cleaning of the mouth, who smoke short clay pipes to the bottom ,and who use an inferior quality of tobacco. The under lip or part of the tongue most in contact with the overheated stem of the pipe is most frequently attacked. These neoplasms grow in the base of the tongue and on the tonsils of those who have lost their teeth, and who hold the pipe deep in their mouth. The weight of the pipe is a source of irritation, and the cancer is found on the side where the pipe is held. Contagion from two men using the same pipe may result. When an early operation is performed on cancroids situated on the lip the prognosis may be favorable, but the reverse is the case when the tonsils or tongue are attacked. Smokers should use a pipe with an amber mouthpiece, and it should never be smoked to the bottom. Acrid tobacco should be avoided.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

PICTURED ROCKS, LAKE SUPERIOR.

Dodging the Question.

It is dangerous to possess a reputation for superior knowledge or wisdom. It is hard to live up to it. Next in importance to knowing everything, perhaps, is to be ranked the ability to conceal one's ignorance.

"Brown," said Jones, "Smith and I here have had a dispute, and have agreed to leave the decision to you. Which is right—'To-morrow is Friday,' or 'To-morrow will be Friday?'"

"To-day is Saturday, isn't it?" said Brown, after some reflection.

"Yes."

"Then neither one of you is right."

And he waved them aside.

A Short Term.

The shortest period that a member of parliament has represented a constituency is two hours. Lord George Hamilton was re-elected as member of the Ealing division of Middlesex, on being appointed secretary of State for India, and the parliament to which he had been admitted was dissolved within two hours after his election.

ALASKA WEATHER.

The Japan Current Protects It from Severest Extremes.

In the midsummer holiday number of The Century there is an article on "The Alaska Trip" by John Muir, the California writer and naturalist. Mr. Muir says:

The climate of all that portion of the coast that is bathed by the Japan current, extending from the southern boundary of the territory northward and westward to the island of Atoo, a distance of nearly twenty-five hundred miles, is remarkably bland, and free from extremes of heat and cold throughout the year. It is rainy, however; but the rain is of good quality, gentle in its fall, filling the fountains of the streams, and keeping the whole land fresh and fruitful, while anything more delightful than the shining weather after the rain—the great, round sundays of June, July and August—can hardly be found elsewhere. An Alaska midsummer day is a day without night. In the extreme northern portion of the territory the sun does not set for weeks, and even as far south as Sitka and Fort Wrangel it sinks only a few degrees below the horizon, so that the rosy colors of the evening blend with those of the morning, leaving no gap of darkness between. Nevertheless, the full day opens slowly. At midnight, from the middle point between the gloaming and the dawn, a low arc of light is seen stealing along the horizon, with gradual increase of height and span and intensity of tone, accompanied usually by red clouds, which make a striking advertisement of the sun's progress long before he appears above the mountain-tops.

For several hours after sunrise everything in the landscape seems dull and uncommunicative. The clouds fade, the islands and the mountains, with ruffs of mist about them, cast ill-defined shadows, and the whole firmament changes to pale pearl-gray with just a trace of purple in it. But toward noon there is a glorious awakening. The cool haziness of the air vanishes, and the richer sunbeams, pouring from on high, make all the bays and channels shine. Brightly now play the round-topped ripples about the edges of the islands, and over many a plume-shaped streak between them, where the water is stirred by some passing breeze.

On the mountains of the mainland, and in the high-walled fiords that fringe the coast, still finer is the work of the sunshine. The broad white bosoms of the glaciers glow like silver, and their crystal fronts, and the multitude of icebergs that linger about them, drifting, swirling, turning their myriad angles to the sun, are kindled into a perfect blaze of irised light. The warm air throbs and wavers, and makes itself felt as a life-giving, energizing ocean embracing all the earth. Filled with ozone, our pulses bound, and we are warmed and quickened into sympathy with everything, taken back into the heart of nature, whence we came. We feel the life and motion about us, and the universal beauty; the tides marching back and forth with weariless industry, laving the beautiful shores, and swaying the purple dulse of the broad meadows of the sea where the fishes are fed; the wild streams in rows white with waterfalls, ever in bloom and ever in song, spreading their branches over a thousand mountains; the vast forests feeding on the drenching sunbeams, every cell in a whirl of enjoyment; misty flocks of insects stirring all the air; the wild sheep and goats on the grassy ridges above the woods, bears in the berry-tangles, mink and beaver and otter far back on many a river and lake; Indians and adventurers pursuing their lonely ways; birds tending their young—everywhere, everywhere, beauty and life, and glad, rejoicing action.

Through the afternoon all the way down to the west the air seems to thicken and become soft, without losing its fineness. The breeze dies away, and everything settles into a deep conscious repose. Then comes the sunset with its purple and gold—not a narrow arch of color, but oftentimes filling more than half the sky. The horizontal clouds that usually bar the horizon are fired on the edges, and the spaces of clear sky between them are filled in with greenish yellow and amber; while the flocks of thin, overlapping cloudlets are mostly touched with crimson, like the outleaning sprays of a maple-grove in the beginning of Indian summer; and a little later a smooth, mellow purple flushes the sky to the zenith, and fills the air, fairly steeping and transfiguring the islands and mountains, and changing all the water to wine.

Fad Parties.

If you are invited to a fad party you are expected to take with you some object that represents your pet fad, and after you have exhibited it you are to talk about it, tell how you acquired it and why, and anything of interest that pertains to it. Until you have attended one of these affairs you can have no idea of the interesting peep it gives you into a hitherto unsuspected side of your friend's life. The man whom you had known only as a thoughtful student reluctantly confesses to a passion for scarfpins, and marvelous may be the stories attached to the getting of some of these. With another it may be weapons, modern and ancient, and doubtless he will prove to be the most peaceful one among you. With one it is photographs, with another snuff-boxes or stamps or old engravings. Almost every one will have some interesting hobby. Among women one will bring a priceless plate and tell you of her Washington plates and other rare and interesting china. Another collects pewter mugs and candle bowls, or fans, or laces.

Have you ever noticed it? There is a nuisance in every neighborhood.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15.....1897

The reception of Mr. Bryan during his recent journey through the west should be enough to convince those too hopeful Republicans and cowardly Democrats in the East who think the silver question has been settled and remains without living interest that they are wrong. At Rapid City, S, D., for example, Mr. Bryan spoke for two hours on bimetalism by which he means silver monometalism. The subject has been discussed interminably, and many persons would not care to be talked to about it for two mortal hours, but 5,000 people from Rapid City and the surrounding towns were on hand to hear his address. When he arrived the entire assemblage rose and waving umbrellas, hats and handkerchiefs, cheered frantically. By means of phonographs and telephones hundreds of people in other towns heard his remarks, at the close of which he had to shake hands for two hours. All this cannot be set down to curiosity, it means business.—N. Y. Sun.

Secretary Wilson of the Agricultural Department is very hopeful with respect to the beet sugar industry of the United States. "Within ten years," he is quoted as saying for publication, "this country will be exporting sugar. I make that prophecy with the utmost confidence, notwithstanding the fact we are now importing $10,000,000 of sugar each year, and that we must manufacture that amount for home consumption, in addition to what we already make, before we can export at a profit." Mr. Wilson's idea is that the whole country will go more or less into sugar-making, and that it will be especially profitable in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys as it is already on the Pacific coast.

Any miner who has a blow pipe, alcohol lamp and a few drops of sulphuric acid can, in a few minutes, determine whether tellurium is present in ores. All that is necessary is to break off a small piece of the ore, place in a small porcelain dish, previously warmed so as to avoid breaking, applying the blower until the ore is at an oxydizing heat, then put one or two drops of sulphuric acid on a porcelain dish; allow it to mix with the ore. The reaction will immediately follow, if tellurium is present, by beautiful carmine and purple colors.—M. & Sci. Press.

The beef market has not been so good in many years as it is to-day. Cattle seem to be selling for less money at Reno than in almost any other section of the country. Cows are quoted at Denver and Omaha much higher than they are selling for here, and steers are very much higher, feeders being quoted at $5 15 gross, which means $10 30 net.—Reno Gazette.

Comptroller Eckles writes long and earnestly in the North American Review of the menace of the multiplication of legislation. True We are dangerously thinking that every ill can be cured by Act of Legislature. Worse than that, we are turning our Constitutions from bills declaring fundamental principles of Government, into plethoric statute books.—Sac. Record-Union.

From 1870 to 1891 there were used in the mines and mills of the Comstock lode 674,765,000 feet of lumber and 391,070,500 cubic feet of cord wood, representing a total cost of about $45,000,000. About 200,000 acres of forest have been destroyed to work these mines.

Under orders from Washington 1,600,000 silver dollars will until further notice be coined monthly at the United States mints, of which $300,000 will be monthly coined at the San Francisco mint.

Mr. Valentine, President of the Wells-Fargo Company, estimates the gold product of 1897 at $215,000,000. Mr. Preston, Director of the Mint, estimates it at $219,000,000.

John W. Mackey, who is reported to be interested in a project to buy the Blair mines at Silver Peak, returned from the mines last Monday, after a week's examination of the property. The great miner did not seem to be at all enthusiastic over the outlook at the Peak. In answer to a direct inquiry as to what he thought of the mines he said: "There is a big country and there seems to be lots of quartz. But the quartz is low grade and it will require the outlay of a large amount of money before anything can be realized. The conditions at Silver Peak are all unfavorable for cheap mining and milling. Wages are high, supplies are high, transportation charges are high. I visited the Peak on the invitation of friends who think of buying the mines. I cannot say whether the sale will be made or not." Mr. Mackey has come and gone and nobody is much the wiser, and whether the mines are to be sold or not is still a mystery.—Hawthorne Bulletin.

Fifty men and one hundred horses are now at work on the Randsburg Railway on the Kramer end, and on Wednesday the first mile of grade was completed, and the whole line will be finished to this town by Nov. 25th. Ramish & Marsh, of Los Angeles, have the contract for the work. The advent of this road is a most important thing for this camp, and should silence all sceptics as to its permanency. While travel to this district is now large, the railroad will bring ten in where one comes at present.—Randsburg Miner, 9th.

The Crawling Centiped.

The crawling centiped is built somewhat on the model of a train of cars, the resemblance being enhanced by the reptile's habit of running straight backward when suddenly confronted. Every joint of its long body has two legs, each jointed and tipped with a sharp point like a bee's sting. Its head is furnished with two pincherlike poison fangs, which work horizontally toward each other, and instead of legs its rearmost joint is furnished with two long hooked claws, which drag behind as the centiped walks, and by which it can hang head downward from any place to which it can fix them. If a chance is given the centiped, it will run from the presence of man, and most of the cases where men have been bitten by one of these reptiles have come about through the man rolling upon them or in some other way crowding them while asleep.

The sensation produced by a centipede's crawling upon the bare skin, with its numerous and keenly pointed feet, is usually described as similar to that of being touched with a redhot poker. If the person thus invaded remain perfectly still, the reptile will crawl off as soon as it can. If an attempt be made to shake it off, it sets every claw into the flesh in the effort to hold on, with an effect like the simultaneous stinging by a score of bees, and if any way it be crowded or jammed it bites, injecting a poison which, though less virulent than that of the tarantula or rattlesnake, causes a serious sloughing from the wound during the progress of recovery.—New York Sun.

The Language of Crime.

The general tendency of the criminal to reduce the abstract to the concrete, to denote the substantive by one of its attributes, is shown very clearly in his syneedochical phraseology. Thus a purse is a leather; a street car is a short, comparing its length with a railroad car; a handkerchief is a wipe, and a pair of shoes a pair of kicks.

Again, some of the terms appear to be purely arbitrary, and were it not that the creative power is absent in criminals as in women I should not hesitate to state it as a fact. But it seems wiser to conclude merely that the origin of these terms has become obscured. To suppose that they were created would be in too distinct contradiction to all obtainable evidence, indirect though it may be. Such expressions are to kip, meaning to sleep; to spiel, to make a speech; jerve, a waistcoat pocket; thimble, a watch; to do a lam, meaning to run.

Some of the expressions are very descriptive. To run from a police officer is to do a hot foot. A person who is always listening to other people's conversation is called a rubber neck. The word push, meaning a crowd, is occasionallly seen in the newspapers. To be arrested is to be pinched; to be convicted is to fall. To refuse a person's appeal is to give him the marble heart. Such expressions require no explanation.—A. F. B. Crofton in Popular Science Monthly.

Is the Sultan Mad?

A curious story, said to be well authenticated, is going the rounds of the European press and explains much that is mysterious in the sultan's conduct. Two days before the Bairam festival, so the tale runs, an aid-de-camp went to Abdul Hamid's room for orders and found him walking up and down with wild gesticulations and incoherent murmurs. As soon as the sultan caught sight of the officer he exclaimed: "Son of a dog, what are you doing here? Do you not see that I am conversing with my father?" The aid-de-camp, in great alarm, was about to withdraw, when Abdul Hamid stopped him, saying, "Prostrate yourself before my father and then execute his commands."

Down dropped the trembling officer on his knees, awaiting the development of events with intense anxiety. A quarter of an hour later his horrible suspense came to an end, for the commander of the faithful, bringing his promenade to an abrupt close, threw himself on a divan, and, looking around the chamber, relieved the mind of the aid-de-camp by inquiring what he was doing and why he had come. The sultan had completely forgotten the previous scene.

The Episcopal Church.

The Church Standard (Episcopal) admits that there is some truth in the charge of sectarian superciliousness often brought against the Episcopal church. "There is," it says, "a good deal of offensive conceit in the way in which we talk about the 'sects' and the 'denominations.' There is something hardly less offensive in the patronizing way in which we sometimes admit the Christian graces which are exhibited in the lives and works of their ministers and members, as if, forsooth, they were a marvel of God's exceptional and wholly uncovenanted grace. If we were as catholic as we pretend to be, or just one-half as catholic as we ought to be, we should behave differently. Different behavior would beget a different disposition toward the church from that which generally prevails among non-Episcopalians."

Witch Superstitions.

In some of the country districts of England the peasants are said to believe that elves and witches steal babies from their cradles and place their own elfin offspring in the place of the robust child. After a child is baptized the witches and fairies have no power over it. Hence the peasants have their little ones baptized as soon as possible.

Rich Men and Debt.

The late Judge Asa Packer believed that a rich man ought to be in debt, because it helped him maintain his credit. "Were I," said he, "to wipe out my indebtedness and at some future time see an opportunity to make a large sum of money and attempt to borrow, everybody would marvel and say Judge Packer was borrowing money. As it is I can borrow almost any amount and no questions are asked or comments made."

Full.

"I have called," said the confident young man with manuscript sticking out of his pocket, "to see whether there is a vacancy in this office."

"No," replied the melancholy editor, as he looked around the place, "I'm sorry to say there is none. Even the waste paper basket is full."—London Answers.

A few weeks ago the editor was taken with a very severe cold that caused him to be in a most miserable condition. It was undoubtedly a bad case of la grippe and recognizing it as dangerous he took immediate steps to bring about a speedy cure. From the advertisement of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the many good recommendations included therein, we concluded to make a first trial of the medicine. To say that it was satisfactory in its results, is putting it very mildly, indeed. It acted like magic and the result was a speedy and permanent cure. We have no hesitancy in recommending this excellent Cough Remedy to anyone afflicted with a cough or cold in any form.—The Banner of Liberty, Libertytown, Maryland. METAL MARKET.

Following are the quotations in New York Oct. 9:

Refined silver	56¾
Copper	11¼
Lead	4.00

Mrs. Blair has gone on a visit to San Francisco.

James Harry, an old-timer of Darwin, is in Independence on legal business.

The Reward Company is working fourteen men at the Hirsch mine and mill.

This year's crop of soda at Owens Lake is the largest ever gathered there.

Bertrand Rhine left for Bakersfield last Monday night by stage from Keeler.

"Glorious rains" in the valley and the mountain tops primed with a first coat of white.

J. C. Crocker and Sam'l Spratt of Big Pine were in town several days during the week.

John Searles, the wealthy borax miner of Borax Lake, died in San Francisco this week.

Supt. Newman is working day and night shifts in the bedrock tunnel in Mazourka Canyon.

William Barrows returned to San Jose last Thursday after a five weeks' stay. He expects to return in the Spring.

Last week Frank Sorba had the thumb and forefinger of his left hand crushed off, at the Montgomery mill, near Ballarat.

Rob't Arnold was in from Panamint valley the other day. He has unskaken faith in a prosperous future for that country.

John Commetti brought in a $1200.00 gold bar yesterday. He makes regular shipments and has one of the best little mines in California.

U. S. Inspector of Surveys Collier is here with assistants respecting surveys on the east side of Owens River and in the Randsburg section.

It is reported here that the mine in Piute Canyon recently purchased by Messrs. Colcord, Yerington, Mills and Parr is a regular bonanza.

The Union district school house has been equipped with a fine new bell, an occasion for gratulation by the parents and pupils of Georges Creek.

District Attorney Forbes and Reporter Laird were called to Bishop last Wednesday to attend a preliminary examination in Justice Dunlap's court.

Mr. McIver has a force of men and teams at work repairing the dam and headgate of the Inyo Canal Co.'s ditch, near the Independence bridge.

The Reward mining force is again being increased to about the old number. Operations have not been, as was reported, entirely suspended at any time.

About thirty men are employed at the Lane mine in Darwin. A complete smelter of 40-tons capacity and hoisting machinery are now on way from Chicago for this mine.

J. White Smith and Mr. Scott of Bishop were admitted to practice law by the Supreme Court at Los Angeles last Tuesday. Both gentlemea passed an excellent examination.

Mr. Burkham, Postmaster at Bodie under the Cleveland administration, passed through town Wednesday on his way to Havilah, where he and other Bodie parties are interested in a pile of gold tailings.

According to the Bodie Miner that place has had "a fearfully dull and monotonous week; nothing going on, nothing to be seen, heard, dug up or imagined." Try something more about Mono Lake gulls.

Robert Barry, an old miner of the Modock and Darwin country, died a few days ago at Ballarat. He himself predicted the event and indicated a burial spot, where he was kindly laid away by the citizens. He was a native of Ireland and 64 years of age.

Mr. and Mrs. Irv. H. Mulholland left for Los Angeles on Friday last, and will remain at that point during the Fair. We hope soon to be advised that "Osito" has again won laurels on the trotting turf.

On Sunday, October 17, religious services will be held as follows: Lone Pine, in the morning at 11 o'clock; Georges Creek, in the afternoon at 2:30 o'clock; Independence, in the evening at 9 o'clock. All are cordially invited to these services. THOS. H. NICHOLAS, Pastor.

The professional card of G. P. Doyle, M. D., will be noted elsewhere in this issue. The Doctor has been engaged in mining operations at Mammoth and near Benton, in Mono, for the past few months and comes to settle. He is from Chicago, where he practiced medicine for two years after graduation, in 1894, from the Rush Medical College of that city.

Surprise Party

Last Saturday evening many of the numerous friends of Mr. and Mrs. James R. Moffett met at their residence on Market street, as a surprising reminder of the fifteenth anniversary of their marriage, known as the "glass wedding." 'Ere your scribe's arrival the most surprising surprise had melted into pleasure, as he found both host and hostess tendering with smiles of welcome the hospitalities of their comfortable and elegant home, in which they were ably seconded by their two charming neices, the Misses Mayes, and gallant nephew, W. L. Davis. The greeting and intercourse of the several guests were equally pleasant, from all of whom good nature and a spontaneous welling up of spirited repartee continously flowed. Among the amusements were many charades, cleverly prepared, many of which were original, and usually as cleverly solved. One of these enigmas was intended to and did correctly represent what is familiarly known as a dampkool, but even with the afterwards apparant unmistakable representation of the character, all failed to drop on the solution. About the midnight hour a substantial lunch was spread, to which each and every one did ample justice, though your scribe was too busy to take more than passing notice of the surrounding situation. Of the surprisers present your scribe noticed the following: Judge and Mrs. Lamar, Mr. and Mrs. Forbes, Mrs. Webb, Mr. and Mrs. Bunney, Mrs. Rhine, Mrs. Hession, Mrs. Vincent, Misses Estella and Lou Robinson, Mrs. Irwin, J. E. Laird, E. J. Eibeshutz, C. Harper, C. Walter, C. Showalter, Misses Clara and Estelle Mayes (the aforesaid charming neices), W. L. Davis, Misses Panzy Loomis, Etta Wood, Lizzie Thompson, George Wood, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Moffett (host and hostess). The children were represented by Irma Webb, Bruce and Wallace Forbes and Lulu Moffett. Presents received were—Mr. and Mrs. Lamar, syrup jug; Mr. and Mrs. Forbes and Mrs. Webb, pickle jar; Mr. and Mrs. Bunney, cake stand; Mrs. Rhine, set of berry dishes; Mrs. Hession, dozen desert dishes; Misses Vincent and Misses Robinson, fruit dish; Mrs. Irwin, salad dish; Messrs. Laird and Eibeshutz, vases; Messrs. Harper, Walter and Showalter, water set; Mrs. Frank, vinegar cruet; Misses Mayes and Mr. Davis, table set.

Croup Quickly Cured.

MOUNTAIN GLEN, Ark.—Our children were suffering with croup when we received a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It affordad almost instant relief. This celebrated remedy is for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

AN OPEN LETTER TO MOTHERS.

We are asserting in the courts our right to the exclusive use of the word "CASTORIA," and "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," as our Trade Mark.

I, Dr. Samuel Pitcher, of Hyannis, Massachusetts, was the originator of "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," the same that has borne and does now bear the fac simile signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on every wrapper. This is the original "PITCHER'S CASTORIA" which has been used in the homes of the mothers of America for over thirty years. Look Carefully at the wrapper and see that it is the kind you have always bought, and has the signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on the wrapper. No one has authority from me to use my name except The Centaur Company of which Chas. H. Fletcher is President.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

How They Wash.

The hardest worked washerwomen in the world are the Koreans. They have to wash about a dozen dresses for their husbands, and inasmuch as every man wears pantaloons or drawers so baggy that they come up to his neck like those of a clown they have plenty to do. The washing is usually done in cold water and often in running streams. The clothes are pounded with paddles until they shine like a shirt front fresh from a Chinese laundry.

The Japanese rip their garments apart for every washing, and they iron their clothes by spreading them on a flat board and leaning this up against the house to dry. The sun takes the wrinkles out of the clothes, and some of them have quite a luster. The Japanese woman does her washing out of doors. Her washtub is not more than six inches high and is about as big around as the average dishpan. She gets the dirt out of the clothes by rubbing them between her hands. She sometimes uses Japanese soap, which is full of grease, and works away with her bare feet. The Chinese girls do their washing in much the same way.

The washing in Egypt is usually done by the men. The Egyptian washerman stands naked on the banks of the Nile and slaps the wet clothes, with a noise like the shot of a pistol, on the smooth stones at the edge of the running water, and such fellah women as wash pound the dirt out of their clothes in the same way.

Frenchwomen pound the dirt out with paddles, often slamming the clothes upon stones, as the Egyptians do.—Exchange.

The Energy of a Cyclone.

The primary cause of the low barometric pressure which marks the storm center and establishes the cyclone is expansion of the air through excess of temperature. The heated air, rising into cold upper regions, has a portion of its vapor condensed into clouds, and now a new dynamic factor is added, for each particle of vapor, in condensing, gives up its modicum of latent heat. Each pound of vapor thus liberates, according to Professor Tyndall's estimate, enough heat to melt five pounds of cast iron, so the amount given out where large masses of cloud are forming must enormously add to the convection currents of the air, and hence to the storm developing power of the forming cyclone. It is doubted whether a storm could attain, much less continue, the terrific force of that most dreaded of winds of temperate zones, the tornado, without the aid of these great masses of condensing vapor which always accompany it in the form of stormclouds.—H. S. Williams, M. D., in Harper's Magazine.

Two Daredevils in Action.

During the peninsular war two English soldiers were standing together when their attention was suddenly arrested by a bombshell thrown near them from the enemy's camp. This was a moment to show "cool courage." One, therefore, knocked the ashes from his pipe, refilled it and exclaimed: "Jack, I'll bet thee a ration I light my pipe at that fuse," pointing at the same time to the shell, the fuse of which was evidently far spent.

"Done," cried the other; "I'll bet thee!"

The challenger accordingly walked up to the shell, lighted his pipe and then deliberately stamped his foot upon the fuse to extinguish it. His comrade, who was close at his elbow, now burst into an amazing fit of passion, blaming him by all the saints in the calendar—not for winning the wager, but for putting out the fuse before he had lighted his own pipe.—Weekly Telegraph.

IMPROVED SPRINKLING WAGON.

A Device That Does Away With Roadside Pumps and Tanks.

A recent improvement in sprinkling wagons bids fair to revolutionize road and street sprinkling in the country where there is no water system to supply water from hydrants. Heretofore it has been the custom to erect pumping plants, or to pipe water from distant points to stations along the road at such distances that the load at one of these stations would last until the wagon reached the next station on its trip. This plan makes necessary the expense of piping, tanks, wells, horse powers, etc., and has always been a very considerable item of expense, and more or less of an obstacle to having roads well watered.

The improvement consists in attaching a gasoline engine and centrifugal pump on a platform at the rear of the sprinkling wagon so that water can be taken from any convenient source. A suction hose with foot valve is attached to the pump which can be lowered into a tank, creek, watering trough, or any water source. The wagon driver then starts the engine, and in from six to ten minutes his wagon is filled.

The illustration shows a wagon and pumping outfit just completed by the Hercules Gas Engine Co., of San Francisco, and now in use by the Supervisors of Tulare county upon the roads near Visalia.

It consists of an improved type of an ordinary sprinkling wagon, and a platform built at the rear of the tank upon which stands a 2½ H. P. Special Hercules Gasoline Engine geared to a 3-inch centrifugal pump. From this pump runs a rubber suction hose and discharge pipe into the tank. The tank holds 12,000 gallons of water which will be filled by the pump in six minutes under ordinary lift, or not to exceed ten minutes lifting twenty feet, and at a cost of about 3 cents for each filling. The uses to which this improvement can be put are not confined to road sprinkling, but it is applicable to any purpose where water has to be hauled, as, for instance, supplying threshing machinery or conveying water from one point to another for any purpose. The simplicity of the engine makes its use perfectly safe and reliable, as it is automatic in action, all that is needed being to open the valve admitting the gasoline, and to give the wheel a start with the hand. It is durable and not at all likely to get out of order, requiring neither engineer nor machinist to keep it in condition for work.

Sprinkling country roads has been considerable of a problem, and it is believed that this improvement will go far towards an economical solution of it. The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco furnish these wagons and engines in any desired capacity, and fully guarantee them in every way.

The English Dislike of Commerce.

We believe that the English, who are in continental opinion a nation of shopkeepers, are not by instinct or by aspiration a trading people at all, or even an industrial one. They are a seafaring people by tendency, and as the sea produces nothing they are compelled to trade, and circumstances have driven them into the industrial life, but their proclivity is toward struggle of any kind, and not, except as an incident in that struggle, toward the making of money. It was quite late in their history that they recognized trading as their vocation, and much later still that they surrendered the notion that to be a trader, whether merchant or manufacturer or dealer in money, was to be comparatively a base person. Till within the last few years all historians thought economics rather unworthy subjects of their pens, and the social distinctions drawn against industry were of the most galling character. Indeed, they have not disappeared yet, the contempt which was once felt for the merchant and the banker being still entertained for the distributor, though he often combines both functions. The great industrial is still hardly reckoned on a par with the great agriculturist, and the shopkeeper of any kind is still placed far below any sort of professional.

Money, it is true, is now almost the only source of irresponsible power, and those who possess it begin, like the powerful in all countries and ages, to be highly regarded, but the grandson of a Tottenham Court road peer would much rather his peerage had been acquired in battle or by chicane than out of a shop, however large. Even the captains of industry, who are like the old barons in many respects, are not thought of as quite their equals, and the greatest of railway builders, say the late Mr. Brassey, is not placed on the level of a great agriculturist, say the late Mr. Coke of Norfolk. The state has honored both, but the popular sentiment, which, and not the state, settles what Greeks are like, condones, rather than delights in, the action of the state. The difference is disappearing, but it dies hard.—London Spectator.

With the Lights Turned Down.

"Do you notice any increase in your gas bills since your daughters are old enough to receive company, professor?"

"You have recalled something, sir, that is inexplicable to me. We regard mathematics as a fixed science, and yet it is a fact that I pay less for gas than when the entire household used to retire together. It's astounding."—Detroit Free Press.

Let him who neglects to raise the fallen fear lest when he falls no one will stretch out his hand to lift him up.—Saadi.

THE PATENT MEDICINE MAN.

He Waited Long For Results, and They Came With a Rush.

"It was more than 20 years ago that I decided the thing was ready to be put on the market," said the inventor of a compound that has now passed out of the category of patent medicines and become well introduced. "The question that bothered me was how to get the stuff before the people and make them personally acquainted with its qualities, so that I might find out whether my own faith and confidence in the article were justified. But how was I to get it into people's hands? That was the question that I had to answer. I went to the wholesale druggists, and they said it would be useless to put it on their shelves, as nobody would buy it. I sent it to doctors, but that did very little toward getting the article into the hands of the people. I gave it away at fairs, and the result was that a small portion of the people there got nearly all of the stuff, while the others went without any. Plainly that would not do. But I didn't know yet what I would do.

"After awhile it occurred to me that I would start a man in a buggy driving in a certain direction. He was to distribute the stuff to everybody he met on the road, and in that way the stuff would finally get into the hands of the people. I was going to have relays enough to stretch a line across the country and start a man from the west to come east through the territory the other man could not reach. I was going to send the stuff on ahead, so that at different points on the road the man would be supplied with enough to give away.

"The fellow started on his long trip and distributed thousands of packages of the stuff. Other men started in different directions, and there were only a few thinly populated and remote corners of the country that could not have some personal experience of my invention. The men finished their trips and I waited. But no response came. The people whom I had expected to answer with a cry for what I had given them remained mute. A year passed, and every cent of available capital had gone into the scheme. Thousands of dollars had gone, and evidently no more had been done toward creating a demand than if the stuff had been locked in a closet and left there. I strained hard, but I never could hear the voice of the public calling for my invention. The months were miserable with suspense and despair until suddenly the public, to speak metaphorically, roared at me. The rush had started in a way I could never understand."—New York Sun.

A Press Built by Franklin.

"I once worked a printing press that was built and operated for a long while by Ben Franklin," said Colonel Charles Gonter. "The machine was quite a primitive affair, but it answered the purpose. I was then a boy in Lancaster, Pa., and was learning the printer's trade in the office of the Lancaster Union. John W. Forney, who made such a success of the Philadelphia Press, was a 'prentice with me, and we took turns working the old Franklin press. It was made entirely of wood except for a marble slab that answered the purpose of a bed. On this slab the forms of type were placed, and they would have to be inked with a long, clumsy roller before each impression.

"One day Forney would wield the roller, and the next day it fell my turn to smear on the ink. We could print about 50 or 75 sheets an hour. The work was laborious, but we performed it cheerfully because of the knowledge that Ben Franklin had done the very same work on the press many a day before we were born. James Buchanan used to come in occasionally and encourage us at our task and predict a brilliant career for both of us if we stuck to the trade we were then learning.

"This was way back in 1841, and I'm a young man yet. Events that are crowded into the years since then contain the history of the building of one of the most powerful nations the world has every known, and the processions of men that have passed in review since then call for the pen of another Plutarch to portray, and that cramped, rickety little Franklin press that John W. Forney and I used to work played a big part in the making of the nation and the making of the processions of men. Still I am not old."—St. Louis Republic.

Friendship In Kentucky.

When Judge Pendleton grows reminiscent, he is always interesting, and when Mr. Henry Tompkins walked in he said: "Mr. Tompkins, your cousin, Louis Garth, was the only bully I ever saw who was a brave man. He was the most overbearing man I ever saw. He was in a poker game in camp with Lieutenant Forrest, a brother of General N. B. Forrest, and he called Forrest a liar. Forrest pulled his pistol, a double barreled weapon, and, placing it to Garth's breast, he pulled the trigger. The cartridge failed to fire, and Garth spat out a chew of tobacco and without moving a muscle said, "Lieutenant, you had better try the other barrel." Forrest put his weapon up and said, "Garth, you are a brave man, and I will not shoot a brave man." They were inseparable friends forever afterward.—Owensboro Inquirer.

It is my creed that a man has no claim upon his fellow creatures beyond bread and water and a grave, unless he can win it by his own strength or skill.—Hawthorne.

SEEK FREE DOCTORS.

Some Queer Experiences In the Public Dispensaries of New York.

The least hope of any change in this charity to all policy is with those dispensaries that are bountifully endowed. The leading institution of this class in New York city is located on the west side, and, in view of its defiant abuse of all kinds of medical charity, has earned for itself the unenviable sobriquet of the "diamond dispensary." It has such a high reputation for the number and pecuniary ability of its patients that it would appear to be rather a credit than a disgrace to receive its outrageously misdirected charity. Such at least is the inevitable conclusion that may be based upon the large average of well to do people who claim daily the benefits of free medical treatment so lavishly and indiscriminately furnished to all who apply. Many of these visitors are from out of town districts and will pay several dollars for car fare, will ask for a written diagnosis of their disease and an extra prescription, and will then complain if they are kept waiting beyond the time for their return train. The examining doctor is content to ride to the dispensary in a horse car; the patient comes and returns in a cab. It is no longer a joke to refer to the display of diamonds or the number of women clad in sealskins in the patients' waiting room, nor does it appear to be unlikely that, in the near future, conveniences will not be required for checking bicycles and distributing carriage numbers in the order of the different arrivals. In this connection, the following description by an eyewitness in the waiting room of this dispensary may be interesting:

"The reception room held about 200 at a time. Nobody was turned away. Fully 50 per cent of the applicants were well dressed, and 10 per cent of them were finely dressed. Three women wore fur coats that had not been handed down from somebody else. There was an attractive display of fine millinery, and the men, more than half of them, bore no evidences of poverty. But all obtained free treatment supposed to be given to paupers—'poor persons.'"

Such instances as the following carry with them their own moral:

"During the examination of a dispensary patient a roll of bills dropped from her pocket. The doctor picked it up and remarked, 'Madam, this is a free dispensary, and as you are able to pay a fee for medical advice I must decline to treat you here.' 'Well,' replied the woman, 'that money is for something else. You are paid by the city and must prescribe for me.' On being assured that the doctor received no salary from any source, the patient became indignant and protested that she was entitled to attention equally with the 'lady' who had preceded her and from whom she had rented a house the week before."—Dr. George F. Shrady in Forum.

England and Russia.

Many believe, says Benjamin I. Wheeler in The Atlantic, that Constantinople has been systematically fortified against the English to the west, but not, at least by land, against Russia to the east. A Russian army can enter Constantinople without great difficulty. When the question of forcing the Dardanelles with an English fleet was agitated last winter, the English naval authorities estimated that of the 19 ships lying at Salonika 6 must be sacrificed to do it. The cards have been stacked for Russia. It looks today as if the ultimate occupation of Constantinople by Russia were a foregone conclusion.

What has England to say? The matter concerns her. It seemed for a time that the discovery of the route by the cape of Good Hope would provide an evasion of the eastern question and free her from the necessity of worrying about the Ægean. But the opening of the Suez canal has changed things, and, as if by jealous interposition of geographic fate, drawn the issue back to the old fighting ground in the eastern Mediterranean. If she is to hold India and Australia, England must control the Suez canal and its approaches.

An Expensive Product.

It is said that the most costly product in the world is charcoal thread. It is at present made in Paris, but by an artisan who carefully conceals himself from the public the better to guard the secret of his craft. Charcoal thread is sold at wholesale by the gramme (15½ grains) and is used for incandescent lamps. That for the 30 candle lamp costs $12,000 per pound and that for 20 candles $8,000 per pound.—New York Ledger.

CONFINEMENT AND HARD WORK indoors, particularly in the sitting posture, are far more prejudicial to health than excessive muscular exertion in the open air. Hard sedentary workers are far too weary after office hours to take much needful exercise in the open air. They often need a tonic. Where can they seek invigoration more certainly and agreeably than from Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a renovant particularly adapted to recruit the exhausted force of nature. Use also for dyspepsia, kidney, liver and rheumatic ailments.

The Absent-minded Professor—Do you know, my dear, I was so busy remembering what you asked me to buy that I actually forgot to stop and get it.

Stop! Women,

And consider that in addressing Mrs. Pinkham you are confiding your private ills to a woman—a woman whose experience in treating woman's diseases is greater than that of any living physician, male or female.

You can talk freely to a woman when it is revolting to relate your private troubles to a man; besides, a man does not understand, simply because he is a man.

MRS. PINKHAM'S STANDING INVITATION.

Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to promptly communicate with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read, and answered by women only. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman. Thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America which has never been broken. Out of the vast volume of experience which she has to draw from, it is more than possible that she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case. She asks nothing in return except your good will, and her advice has relieved thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.

THE SONGS MY MOTHER SUNG.

As one who stands at evening by the ocean's lonely shore
May hear the voice of Memory above the breakers' roar,
So, calm and clear and beautiful as bells for curfew rung,
I hear above life's surge and flow the songs my mother sung.

I've sought the light of Fortune's smile in many a distant bourn,
Found many a fount of gladness and learned what it means to mourn;
And many are the voices, mild with love, or harsh with strife,
Whose tones for me have mingled in the symphony of life.

A moment's retrospection, and all these to calm subside,
And from the land of Childhood, far across Time's restless tide,
The veil of mist is lifted which the years between have hung,
And looking back, I hear again the songs my mother sung.

I'm a child again—the twilight steals across the upland farm,
And homeward from my play I come through evening's mellow charm;
The crickets and the katydids are singing through the dew,
And one pure star buds into light in heaven's liquid blue;

I toss my cap upon the floor, and mother's hand, so fair,
Draws to her heart the little lad and smooths his tumbled hair;
She smiles to feel the chubby arms so loving round her flung,
And hark!—I hear them rising now, the songs my mother sung.

And when the simple prayers were said, and down to sleep I lay,
She bent and kissed me, and that kiss is on my brow to-day;
I fancied round her fair white face the very darkness smiled
(She ever wore an angel-look when she was with her child),

And softly from the distant woods I heard the whip-poor-will,
But in that dear and hallowed hour her voice was softer still:
Sweet breezes stirred the window where the honeysuckle clung,
But dreamland caught its music from the songs my mother sung.

There was no voice more wonderful for love was all its tone,
And love hath never heard a tongue more beauteous than its own;
And where the proud world fails to win our homage with its art,
Love's simple song unchallenged takes the fortress of the heart.

What wonder that when life is hard I smile back through my tears
As I hear those holy echoes haunt the hushes of the years!—
What wonder when Care's stormy bells against my calm are swung
The Past speaks comfort to my heart in the songs my mother sung!

Oh, sacred bond that through all time in blessedness remains!—
A voice hath bound me to the Past by Music's viewless chains;
For where Love links its golden words between the heart and home
There is a charm that holds the thought howe'er the feet may roam;

So, fondly from my toil and care my heart will backward turn,
And I shall be a child again, and for God's altars yearn,
Whenever that sweet angelus across life's sea is rung,
That music out of Childhood's heav'n—the songs my mother sung.

THE CONVICT'S YARN.

Egyptology in the days when I was at college, before I took to the profession which I followed for many years, was my chief delight, and to the fact that I was a student of the ways of ancient Egypt I owed one of the luckiest hauls of my life.

It fell out in this way: We had long turned our eyes with ardent looks toward the establishment of Mr. Pontifex, jeweler and valuer, of 2 Moore Lane, city, the contents of whose shop were said to be worth some £20,000.

Mr. Pontifex, in addition to being a jeweler and valuer, was also a bit of an enthusiast on Egyptian relics, and one often saw paragraphs in the paper regarding recent additions made to his Egyptian museum at Norwood.

One day my chum, Dick Herring, lounged into my room smoking a clay and reading a newspaper.

"Listen to this, guv'nor. Seems a waste, doesn't it?"

"Fire away," I returned, "and I'll give you my opinion afterward."

"'We understand that Mr. Christopher Pontifex, the well-known jewler, of Moore Lane, E. C., has just ordered a mummy, purvidin', o' course, that it was to be lodged over the shop. What, ho!' he concluded, with a wink at me.

I laughed. "I agree with you," I said. "I shouldn't have any objection at all to changing places with the mummy, say between the hours of midnight and 2 a. m., but I don't quite see how it's to be done."

"More don't I, guv'nor," returned Dick, moodily.

He then relapsed into silence, blowing great clouds from his pipe, and the business passed out of my mind. It was recalled to me, however, in a very sudden manner some two months later, when, passing down a street near the Strand, I espied close to a pillar box a letter already stamped and addressed for posting, but which had evidently missed the box and fallen to the ground. Acting on the principle which has always led me to obtain as much knowledge as I can, I opened the envelope and was astonished to find that it was from Messrs. Wood & Sons and was addressed to Mr. Pontifex. This is what it said:

Dear Sir—The mummy to your esteemed order has now arrived at Southampton, and we expect it in London to-morrow. Will you kindly say if we can deliver same to-morrow afternoon? We understand the mummy is to be deposited first of all on your premises at Moore Lane. Awaiting your reply, we are, yours very obediently,

WOOD & SON.

As I read these words a happy thought flashed across my brain, and I resolved to put it into execution at once. Going straight to a telegraph office in the city I sent the following message to Wood & Sons:

Leaving London for a few days retain mummy till further notice.

PONTIFEX.

The message having been duly dispatched, I took my way at once to my lodgings, where I found my chum, Herring, sitting disconsolately on the sofa.

"Buck up, Dick, my lad!" I cried. "I think we're in luck at last. Read that letter."

I handed him the note which I had picked up near the pillar box, and he read it carefully. Then he said:

"Where's the luck in that, guv'nor?"

"What would you say if I told you that I intended to impersonate the mummy which Mr. Pontifex has ordered, and that, moreover, I intend to carry off all that I can lay my hands on during the night following my being delivered into his keeping?"

He smiled incredulously.

"How's it to be done, guv'nor? It's a knockout plan, of course, but how's it to be done?"

"It will be by no means an easy task," I made answer, "and it's risky, but it may be done with care and discretion. Being extremely thin, I have the 'make-up' of an ideal mummy. The first thing we have to obtain is an ancient mummy coffin, which I will go and buy at once."

I then proceeded to the establishment of the Messrs. Wood, where I bought an imitation coffin. The real article would have been exceedingly dear, and so I contented myself with a colorable imitation. Deep down in a huge recess I packed a long overcoat with capacious pockets, a few necessary tools, a lantern with matches and a few other handy appliances.

This being done, I obtained a quantity of butter cloths in which I was to be swathed. To give the same an ancient and brownish appearance I smoked them at the fire, the effect after that process being admirable.

Herring gave me valuable service, and we also enlisted the help of Jack Tovey, an ingenious youngster who had often done good work for us in days gone by.

He showed himself an apt pupil at the mummy business, and when I had rehearsed the attaching of the butter cloths to Herring's figure, as an example of the manner in which it should be done, he expressed himself as being quite able to do the same office for me when the time came.

It was a dangerous game, and only too well did I know it, but I determined to hope for the best and trust to the luck which always seemed to belong to me.

I determined to lose no time in carrying out the scheme because, although delays are dangerous everywhere, they are especially so in our profession. I therefore arranged that I should be conveyed to Mr. Pontifex's house in Moore Lane arrayed as the mummy to his order on the following afternoon, Friday.

Fortunately the weather was very gloomy at the time and King Fog was over all things.

We engaged a spring cart to convey the coffin containing me to Moore Lane, and at 4 o'clock on Friday afternoon we set out, my chums and I. In speaking of myself I should, perhaps, use the word "it," for never did any live man present so dead an appearance as I on that occasion. If it had not been for fear of bursting some of the butter cloths I should have broken out into hearty laughter, for the whole affair seemed to me one of the finest comedies on record.

At length the coffin was duly deposited in the room, and then I heard Pontifex tell the car men to withdraw the lid. This they did, and then I could feel that the jeweler was gazing at me fixedly, and knew that if detection were to come it would come now. Thank heaven, it did not come! On the contrary, the worthy dealer in precious stones seemed greatly impressed with his purchase and insisted on delivering a short homily to the car men on the subject.

"See here, my good men," he said in an unctuous, satisfied voice; "see here, and admire the work which the ancient Egyptians knew so well how to perform. Think of the ages which have rolled by since Ptolemy I. lived and ruled! Think of the millions who have since then turned into dust, and yet here am I able to look to-night on the intact body of that very king! Ah, a marvelous science, the science of embalming! Marvelous indeed!"

The hours went by with a slowness that tortured me. My face was on fire with perspiration, and though I could breathe through some small holes we had made in the butter cloths, my whole position was so exceedingly painful that I do not think I would go through such an ordeal again even for twice the temptation.

I heard the church clock in Cheapside strike the hours, and the interval between each hour seemed like a week. At length midnight struck, and then I knew that my awful rest was near its end. I could hear the servants locking up for the night.

I could hear Pontifex bidding them good night as he passed up stairs to bed, and half an hour later the house was as silent as the tomb.

"The time has come," I thought, "for Ptolemy to come to life. Here goes!"

I had provided myself with a ring to which a small blade was attached, and working away with the same I was able after much toil to free my arms, and afterward, of course, the work was comparatively easy, but for ten minutes or so I could not rise, my limbs being too cramped to allow of my doing so.

At the end of that time I pulled myself together, and making a mighty effort I leaped out. Siezing my lantern I lit it, and then put on the overcoat and other clothing which I had concealed in the deep receptacle.

Having put on my India rubber shoes and collected my professional instruments, I went down stairs silently, and soon found my way into the shop toward the treasures of which we had so long turned our eyes and which treasures now lay within my reach. I made a deliberate selection, filling my pockets with the precious stones in generous profusion.

A low whistle outside told me that my faithful pal, Herring, was watching to see that my coast was clear for my exit. I therefore took my way out into the passage, and using my best efforts to make no noise I slid back the great bolts and turned the key of the massive house door.

Everything went perfectly. The lane was deserted and I walked rapidly in the direction of the Mansion House, where I was joined by Herring, who burst into a loud peal of laughter when he saw me.

"'Ow are yer, Mr. Tollerrmy?" he said. "Give us yer 'and. Blow if yer ain't the coolest bloke wot I ever set eyes on."

Then he said no more, and we walked on silently till we reached our den in St. Luke's. Next morning a train from Charing Cross conveyed us to Folkstone, whence we journeyed to Paris, and from there to Brussels, where the swag was duly sold and split up into shares.

My companions, Herring and Tovey, decided that as I had had the lion's share of the work I should also have the same share of the proceeds, and the result was that I was richer by the night's transactions to the tune of something very much like £8,000.—London Tit-Bits.

What an Ocean Steamship Carries.

The famous steamship Great Eastern, historically associated with the first efforts to lay Atlantic telegraph cables, has hitherto been regarded as the largest vessel ever launched. Its laurels as a sea leviathan, however, are of late endangered. The new ocean freighter Pennsylvania, although scarcely attaining the external measurements of the former celebrated ship, will carry far more cargo. The capacity, indeed, of these new freight ships is a matter for astonishment to a landsman.

The Pennsylvania, for example, is rated at twenty thousand tons burden, and will carry loads such as may be briefly itemized thus:

160,000 bushels of wheat in bulk, equal to three hundred and twenty carloads, or sixteen trains of twenty cars each.

1,000 tons of flour, eighty carloads.

4,000 boxes of bacon, seventy-five carloads.

3,000 tierces of lard, forty-eight carloads.

1,300 bales of cotton, forty carloads.

1,200 head of live cattle, eighty carloads.

3,600 quarters of dressed beef.

In addition there will probably be a thousand tons of miscellaneous merchandise, say eighty carloads more; in all not less than seven hundred and eighty carloads, or thirty-nine long trains of twenty cars each.

Nor is the above by any means the entire load of this modern ark. The Pennsylvania will have accommodations for from eight hundred to one thousand steerage passengers, as also for a crew of one hundred and fifty men and fifty cattlemen, with food and fodder for all.

In the fuel bins, too, there will be carried a burden of 1,300 tons of coal, or more than one hundred carloads.

If we were to say that the entire agricultural product of sixty New England towns, or twenty Western counties, could all be stowed away in this mammoth ship, we should not exceed the facts.

She Was Too Kittenish.

At the lemonade table in a Worcester fair the other night a patron related the story of a pretty English woman who dispended similar fluid at a society function. Exorbitant prices were asked and men were wheedled into contributions by various seductive methods. A wealthy man of title was informed that a glass of lemonade would cost him a shilling. Then the fair custodian took a sip from it, and as she smacked her pretty lips said: "Now this cup will cost you a guinea." The patron pulled out the sum, and as he laid it down said: "Here's the guinea; now please give me a clean glass."

RUM IN COLONIAL TIMES.

There Were Sixty-three Distilleries in Massachusetts.

The power of rum as a commerical factor in the colonies was at its height about 1750. That year the royal treasury report gave sixty-three distilleries in Massachusetts turning molasses into rum. This formed the store for about 900 vessels engaged in various branches of trade—400 in cod fishing, 200 mackerel fishing, 100 whalers, etc. Newport kept pace relatively with Boston. Refuse codfish paid for much of the molasses.

Connecticut attempted to prohibit distilling, because it made molasses scarce, but the prohibition was very hastily stopped when the citizens found that business went where rum could be obtained. Rum proved the best New England commodity in all trading operations. Rum was the Indian's choice, in fact his only acceptance, as payment for his peltries; it was chosen with equal eagerness by the Virginian or Carolinian in exchange for his tobacco. The Newfoundland fishermen wished it in return for codfish, and, most important of all, on the Guinea coast New England rum entirely vanquished French brandy as a medium for acquiring slaves. The commerce in rum and slaves afforded all the ready money that paid for any merchandise in England. It was the driving power of all commercial machinery. The circuit was powerful at every step. The Yankee vessel laden with home-made rum sailed to the African coast. The rum was bartered to great advantage for negroes. The negroes were carried to and sold at a large profit at the West Indies and the distillation in Newport and Boston started afresh the round of New England money-making. Sometimes trade was so brisk that the market was stripped of rum.

In the year 1752 Isaac Freeman wanted a cargo of rum for the African trade. He sent to Newport, where there were then thirty great rum distilleries in full blast. His correspondent wrote that he could not have it for three months. "There are so many vessels loading for Guinea we can't get our hogsheads of rum for cash. We have been lately to New London and all along the seaport towns in order to purchase molasses, but we can't get one hogshead."

The shipmasters were not above watering the rum to make it go as far as possible. Old Merchant Potter instructed his captains to "trade with the blacks, worter ye' rum as much as possible, and sell as much by short messur as you can."—Brockton (Mass.) Times.

Extracting Information.

The man who sits in a city railway station at the "Bureau of General Information" must, like "the little busy bee," gather honey "from every opening flower." When off duty, he should be refilling his memory with all sorts of knowledge, for at the bureau he must be "on tap" to every man, woman or child thirsting for information. A similar burden rests on lawyers in large practice, and on clergymen whose popularity makes the public their parishioners.

That eminent preacher, the late Charles H. Spurgeon, was once asked by an American visitor, who had noticed that an orphanage, a theological school, a church and many correspondents kept him busy from morning to night:

"Pray, Mr. Spurgeon, when and where do you compose your sermons?"

"I am always at that," replied the preacher. "I get something from every one I meet. I shall suck a sermon from you before I am through with you."

A distinguished British seaman, the late Admiral Sir George Tryon, used to act on the preacher's rule. When secretary to the British Admiralty he was obliged to pay the penalty attached to the post of dining at city banquets, guild and private dinners. Being invited to more dinner parties than he could go to, he used to pick and choose among them. His wife, for a long time, was ignorant of the rule which guided her husband in refusing certain invitations and accepting others.

At last she discovered that he accepted only those invitations which would lead him to places where he might meet some one who could give information of value to him in his profession. He cared nothing for the gossip which makes up the talk at a fashionable dinner party, but he was on the lookout for useful information, and was ready to extract it from any source. Like Spurgeon, he learned something from everybody.—Youth's Companion.

DECLINE OF SPAIN.

GREAT LOSS OF TERRITORY IN A HUNDRED YEARS.

Once Owned Nearly All of Both Americas—Cuba All that Is Left—That Likely to Be Dropped Because Too Hot to Hold.

Sold and Lost in War.

In losing its hold upon Cuba Spain gives up almost its final possession in the New World. It still holds a tiny island, but uses it only as a coaling and provision station.

Columbus found a continent across the Atlantic and took possession of it in the name of his sovereign. Then Spain "owned" the New World. But other explorers immediately took possession of corners of it. England took a big slice. People came from Holland and parts of England, and, banding themselves together, finally called themselves the United States.

In 1801 Spain found herself deprived of the continent she had discovered 350 years before to a great extent. The entire eastern coast was gone, both in North and South America, and there were alarming inroads in the center. But Spain still owned California, Florida, Central America and all the western part of South America.

To-day she owns nothing. Cuba is practically gone from her. She does not govern it, neither does she get its products. The rest of North America has passed away by conquest, by grant or by purchase. South America, true, has Spaniards living in it. But they have formed independent colonies and are known as Chileans, Bolivians, Peruvians and Colombians. They love Spain, but they love themselves more. They will not pay direct tribute or join in her government.

Spain must soon withdraw to the Eastern hemisphere, where she has a lovely little peninsula, and confine herself to that territory and a few rich little islands in the Pacific that still belong to her.

In losing North and South America Spain has shown not such bad generalship, nor in the opinion of her sovereigns such bad judgment. England is the only country that has been able to divide herself gracefully and govern lands across an ocean. She does it by a broad policy that allows home rule and almost absolute independence on the part of the Governor General. Victoria Regina's name is upon the official notepaper and her head upon the money, but she does not "grind" the people or compel them to pay more than they would have to pay to their own government of they were "free."

Spain in giving up her western lands had made some pretty good deals. Others were not so good. The outcome of the Cuban war will tell whether she has profited by the Cuban struggle. If she gets it absolutely back it will be hers forever to hold in a state of menial subjection to punish and starve for generations to come. But if she parts with it and makes it self-governing, she will not get the tribute from it which the island needs to pay its own debts.

Spain's first loss, in the early part of the century, was the great district calling itself Louisiana. Spain had got Louisiana in 1762 from the French, who originally discovered it. But when Napoleon became Consul he got Louisiana back, and the big "New Orleans territory," and held them secure. This embraced all the southern and middle portions of the United States, and was the largest and richest piece of land then known.

The United States got it from the French in 1803 by paying $15,000,000, and it is said that the Spanish have never ceased to mourn that they could not have held it until this purchase, which would have enriched their then diminished coffers greatly.

Spain's next loss was Mexico, by conquest, in 1813. On that date Mexico declared herself free. And then began a long series of wars, in which all countries joined, but which resulted in Mexican independence on hard and sure grounds in 1848. Spain lost heavily by this war.

Texas still was Spanish territory. But by act of United States Congress in 1845 Texas was purchased from Spain. It had a debt of $7,500,000, which it seemed as if it could never pay off, and Spain allowed the United States to take Texas if it would assume that debt. There was vigorous opposition at the time, as the country was in a state of financial distress. But Congress insisted, and with what good results the subsequent history of Texas shows.

Spain by this act lost a territory of 318,000 square miles, and twice as large as Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania all three put together.

Florida meanwhile had been purchased of Spain in 1819 for $5,000,000. There were 67,000 square miles, and the whole country was rich in vegetation and minerals. It was called the floral region of the New World and was named for the Spanish Easter, upon which day it was discovered.

England, all this while, had been taking pieces of country from the original Spanish owners. Part of its present Canadian territory it got because the Spanish wanted to join the English. Much it got from the French, who had taken it forcibly from the Spanish. A little it got by purchase.

So rapidly did the land pass out of the hands of the Spanish Crown that, within a generation the lower half of North America from being a Spanish country became part of the United States. California was added to the United States in 1848, after the Mexican struggle. It embraced the immense tract that is now divided up into six States, and in 1849 it became the Territory of California. A few men, now known as "the forty-niners," went there and came back with such astounding reports of the richness of its fruit, the fineness of its wood and the variety of its ore that others started out. There were fairy tales told of its glittering sand. In 1850 it became a State and soon proved to be the purse of the United States, holding money that could be traded off with foreign countries for that which the United States needed.

Neither Spain nor Mexico would have parted with California, including Oregon, if they had known what lay there. The old Spanish residents tried to keep the secret, and from that fact comes the romantic Spanish stories of the West.

DARK PORTIONS SHOW SPAIN'S POSSESSIONS IN 1801 AND TO-DAY.

A Magnetic Drill.

The use of magnets for lifting purposes and as a substitute for clamps is rapidly extending, and to see the ease and facility with which a five-ton casting can be picked up and carried around the shop is very striking. With the old process holes have to be bored in masses of metal in all sorts of odd and inconvenient places and at angles so that very often it is necessary to rig clamps for holding the drilling machine to its work. The application of the portable electric motor for this purpose was a long step in advance, and this method has been of great service in dealing with the armor of the new cruisers. When a portable drill, however, is coupled with a magnetic clamping device the ideal conditions are realized. Dr. Louis Bell recently described a drill of this pattern. It consists of a motor and its worm-driven drill, together with a universal mounting of four adjustable feet. When placed fairly upon a ship's plate or other mass of iron these drills have an adhesive force of nearly half a ton each. The drill can then be adjusted and clamped by the simple turning of a key, and it will then bore holes up to an inch in diameter as fast as it can be safely worked. The whole affair weighs only about 200 pounds. These portable drills in small sizes, particularly when the clamping is magnetic, are invaluable in general machine shop practice, and in modern building work.—Engineering Magazine.

Cost of Trolley Power.

A table taken from the annual reports of the railroad commissioners of New York and Massachusetts for nearly all of the street railway properties shows the cost of the electric power required to run a car one mile, under average conditions of load, etc. The table gives the number of cars owned, the car mileage per year and the cost of the electric power per mile and per passenger. Of the nineteen companies operating less than 250,000 car miles four are obtaining power at a cost of less than 2 cents per car, six between 2 and 3 cents, five between 3 and 4 cents, one between 4 and 5 cents and three at more than 5 cents; of the five companies operating over 5,000,000 car miles per year one obtains the power for less than 1 cent per car mile, three between 1 and 2 cents, and one between 2 and 3 cents; other similar figures are also given between these limits. The Brooklyn Heights Company has the cheapest power, 0.86 per car mile, followed by the Binghamton with 0.94; the cost of power for Massachusetts roads includes repairs and depreciation of the station plant, which is not the case of the New York roads.—Street Railway Journal

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8 1897

E. R. Moses, Chairman of the National Executive Committee, at the Irrigation Congress held in Salt Lake, said in part:

"The people of the United States must know of their country in order to judge intelligently of the wants and needs of any part of it, and then they must have that love of country so strong in their hearts that they forget self, section birthplace and State in their great desire to build up America as 'the land of the free and the home of the brave.' When this is done there will no longer be a flaunting of the bloody shirt at every husting or in every spread-eagle speech, the constant repetition of 'A solid South,' a grasping East,' and 'A wild and woolly West.'

"The time has come when this Nation, like the other nations of the earth, must ever be alert in making due and ample preparation for the comfort and happiness of her people.

"This Government, founded, as it was, upon that grand and paternal proposition, 'To secure the blessings of liberty and hapiness to ourselves and our posterity,' can no longer forget her posterity than a father can his child. Forget them, I say, by withholding from them for settlement the many thousands of homes that lie in this Western country—homes that are their birthright as much so as the homesteads that are now the castles of so many true, brave and noble American citizens. Heretofore this Government has been generous with her free homes for her people.

"The people living in this section are most patriotic, and many of the 2,000,000 or more idle and homeless people in the crowded and congested cities of the East are looking for the time when these Western lands are made available for a settlement. Philanthropists and humanitarians see the great opportunity for solving one of the most vital and serious questions of the times—the settling of the worthy unemployed and homeless upon these lands; while politicians and statesmen realize the fact, if they do not carry it into practice, that the safety and perpetuity of this Government lies in having homes for its worthy, homeless citizens.

"The time has come, in the minds of all who fully know the condition of the East and West, that this country can no longer remain half settled and half unsettled, any more than it could have remained half free and half slave. Individual and co-operative efforts have gone as far as they can go. Uncle Sam owns this unsettled land and it has now come to the parting of the ways; either the Government must open these lands or turn them over in fee simple to the States and Territories in which they lie, that they may open them for settlement. The settlement of the West means only, that the products of the soil go East for the products of the loom and the factory; that the settling of the surplus population in the West relieves the East of great financial burdens. The opening of the West will not only give homes to the present homeless, but to future thousands, instead of forcing them abroad, like England, France and Germany do their homeless people, for want of territory.

"If any bill is passed for the reclamation of arid and semi-arid America, it must first be drafted by this body or the people of the West. The last Irrigation Congress passed upon a bill, a very good one, for a starter, known as the 'Public Lands Commission Bill.' It was introduced in the House of Representatives near the close of the session and awaits resurrection. It has firm supporters in both Houses, and with proper efforts on the part of this Congress could become a law.

"More acres are under cultivation by means of irrigation than ever before, and perhaps more miles of irrigating ditches have been built in the last few years than in all previous years.

"Through the annual Congresses an impetus has been given another line of industry that has worked night and day to perfect pumps and machines to draw water from the bowels of the earth at such a minimum cost as to make it profitable to irrigate in this way. The ingenious mind has been set at work to conserve the stormwaters that run in torrents to the sea. The eyes of the East and South have been opened to the fact they, too, can ditch, drain and apply the water at proper times and receive better results. We irrigationists are satisfied that Congress will have to adopt our plan of preventing the overflow of large streams by the storage of waters near the heads of such streams, in such a manner as to feed the streams at times of low water, and at other times to be used in irrigation, navigation and manufacturing industries; and, in this way, the damage to life and property now caused each year by overflows will be prevented and large tracts of arid lands can be reclaimed by these waters and opened for settlement.

"The people of the Nation would soon find it a paying investment if Congress would apply the appropriations annually made to prevent floods, temporary makeshifts, to the storage of the waters as well as for the use of agriculture and horticulture. Following in the wake of irrigation and closely alied to it, is colonization. The people of the West do not want these lands made tillable unless they can teem with the life and are settled with the best brain and brawn of the old and the young, rich and poor, who desire homes in this sunset land of America."

Senator John P. Jones is interested in a project to build a narrow gauge railroad from Skaguay to the Klondike county.

THEY DO NOT DIE.

Some days ago a San Francisco paper published a number of autographic certificates of people familiar with death scenes, declaring that a young man in a Southern California city had died; that all the evidences of actual death were present, not a single indication was lacking. The wife of the man came in and insisted upon attempting resuscitation, whereupon vigorous applications were made and after an hour or two the breath of life returned, and the man is now up and about. Then follows the statement that as he began to breathe he exclaimed: "O, why did you bring me back." His subsequent relation was that he was dead; that his spirit took its departure from the body, and he was inexpresibly happy. He saw his father at his bedside, who accompanied part way upon a journey through fair fields of surpassing beauty, and in the far distance he heard music of such entrancing character that he is unable to describe it. Presently he felt a powerful influence drawing him back to his body, and with a pang of awful pain he revived and found himself once more alive. The father of the young man declares that as he saw his son die, a great longing to go with him was felt. The youth himself says he is now convinced that there is life beyond death, and he is satisfied and anxious to die in all fullness.

There have been scores of just such instances related. They are all similar; a pang of great pain, then ineffable content and peace, and on return great pain and woful regret. A lady, whom we know to be of unimpeachable veracity, was near to death. Apparantly she did die, and her friends were convinced that life had left the body. After some hours she revived. Her story is that her spirit left the body, and seemed to pervade all space. She was perfectly happy, with not a thought for anything left behind. She felt that she was expanding and filling space, and what she saw and heard filled her with supremest joy. Striving to go out further she looked back and saw a slender golden thread connecting her with earth. At that instant it began to contract and draw her to her body, which she plainly saw, surrounded by weeping friends. She resisted, but the more she struggled the more she was drawn back, and finally, with awful pain, she reentered the body. To this day she sighs with regret that she was restored.

Such instances are of record by the hundreds. But they do not prove death or glimpses of the other world. They only testify to a condition in which the bodily senses in part are suspended from action, while the fancy of being is quickened into abnormal activity. In that state he or she revels in paradisical delights. Those resuscitated after apparent drowning, all agree that after the first pang when the lungs fill with water, there is only the most exquisite pleasure, perfect content, and a longing desire to thus continue.

Search of the testimonies of all human experience gives us not a single point upon which to hinge the belief that one human being who has thus passed into the great unknown has ever returned to give account of his experience. Against this universal testimony there stand only the records of the miracles, which we do not propose to discuss, since they involve questions of faith. It is proof of the glorious wisdom of the Great Cause, that it is not given us to know by experience what the hereafter is. All the stories of those who have apparently died and gone out of the body are simply recitals—honest enough—of fancy free in clairvoyant or cataleptic state, in which joys revealable to fleshly senses have been experienced. These are recited with perfect conviction that they were spiritual experiences, but they were not.

The eternal, unchangeable laws of nature; the unalterable decrees of a merciful God, forbid that in one or many instances the barriers of those laws should be suspended or their action reversed. The conception of God forbids that to the few there shall be revealed any part or portion of the future state with capacity to return and relate any such experience. The young man in the south did not die; he did not go out of the body; he did not see glorious fields, nor revel in music of the spheres. He no doubt believes that he did. But the hashheesh eaters have these experiences without any pretense that they are severed from the mold of clay. The opium eater floats in the atmosphere of the seventh heaven and his mortal powers are incapable of telling of the heavenly raptures he experiences.

The Mason Valley copper smelter is completed, and has started up on a run of ore from what was the old McConnell claim. Messrs. Nelson and Hardy, of the Boston-Nevada Copper Company, promoters of the project, were on the ground when the start was made, and a great many Mason Valley people were also present to witness the inauguration of an industry which, it is hoped, will bring an era of prosperity to that section of the country. The promoters of the enterprise are well satisfied with the working of the plant, and they certainly deserve success, for the plant has cost them close to $50,000. The plant is of forty tons capacity per day, but for a start is not being run to quite its full capacity. The company estimates that it has ore enough in its own mines to keep the smelter in operation most of the time, but custom ore will be worked, and it is understood that the price for working will be $7 per ton. This will stimulate the mining industry in Mason Valley greatly.—Dayton Times.

Attorney-General Fitzgerald, in response to an inquiry from the State Department of Highways, has given the opinion that under the present law a county has authority to issue bonds for road purposes, and that a Board of Supervisors has no authority to transfer money from the general fund to the road funds and expend it for road purposes.

It may be well to suggest that all who drive horses widen their tires against the time when the law goes into effect—the first day of 1900. Elsewhere steam rollers are now in line with this policy and it won't hurt any teamster or farmer to join the procession whenever it becomes necessary to make any repairs to his vehicles, even if he anticipates the enforcement of the act; he won't be arrested for it. Whoever has not yet tried broad tires has a pleasant surprise in store; he will witness a great saving in horseflesh and a decided improvement in the roads wherever the enlightened mind has applied this broad policy. Wide tires are like snowshoes; they get over the crust of the earth without crushing through to the inner nothingness; in so doing the work saved for each horse is immense. Under the law, soon to be enforced, the required widths run all the way from three inches (for a 2¾-inch steel or thimble-skin axle or for a 1⅞-inch tubular steel or iron axle) to six inches (for a 4-inch, and larger, steel or thimble-skein, or for a 2¼-inch, and larger, steel or iron axle, or for a 3¼-inch, and larger, tubular steel or iron axle). People who are now buying new wagons should bear these facts in mind.

United States to Arthur Bell—Patent to 160 acres land at Blackrock.

Superb fall weather.

Stated meeting of Masonic Lodge tomorrow night.

Mrs. Frank Fitzgerald spent several days visiting in town this week.

A lawsuit in the Justice's Court brought all the men in from the Keys camp yesterday.

Arthur Nobles made final proof on his homestead entry south of town last Tuesday.

S. E. Vermilyea, Esq., came down from Bishop last Monday on Superior Court business.

It is reported that the Searles borax plant in southern Inyo and northern Kern has been sold to the Smith syndicate.

Mrs. Julia Roughney of Big Pine desires to thank the friends who so kindly came to her assistance during her recent illness.

The Los Angeles Fair begins next Wednesday and continues nine days. It will be the biggest race meeting ever held in the State.

Sam Gruber and Mose Brockman came in from Mazourka yesterday with a sack of gold dust. Klondike isn't in it with this country.

The sheep men are now going south with their bands and all the ranchers in this vicinity have sold their fall feed at good prices. It comes very acceptable about tax time.

R. S. Miner, Esq., arrived at Independence last Monday and expects to leave for Los Angeles next Monday to look after the interests of Inyo county in the sheep license cases.

The rain of last week will cause a temporary cessation of dry washing in the Mazourka district. While there are no phenominal strikes reported there is a very steady output of gold.

Sheriff Given, Dave Johnson, J. W. Murphy and C. H. Prahm left town yesterday morning for Stecker's Bench on a deer hunt. Both deer and grouse are reported to be very plentiful there.

Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Gorman left for San Francisco last Tuesday. Mr. Gorman will represent Inyo Lodge, No. 221, F. & A. M., at the Grand Lodge and Mrs. Gorman will remain about a month visiting relatives.

Schober's team passed through town Tuesday on the way to Mojave. It had in trail the Babcock chemical fire engine purchased at Bodie for Randsburg. The value of such machine as a fire extinguisher depends wholly upon the speed and alacrity with which it is handled, but it is the only recourse of a dry camp.

The amount of taxes to be paid this year will be about two and a half cents less on the hundred than last year, although the rate is higher. Figure it out for yourself. Last year the rate was 2.15 on the 100, this year it is 2.50 on 85, the State Board of Equalization having reduced all taxes in the county 15 per cent.

In Esmeralda county, Nev., where all, if any, of its paying business is done, the Carson and Colorado Railroad is assessed upon a valuation of $1,650 per mile. In Inyo it is assessed by the California State Board of Equalization at a valuation of $2,137 14 per mile—no 15 per cent reduction on this, but on account of such reduction on all other property (except money) the State and county tax rate is raised from $2.15 to 2.50 and the rate in nine specially taxed school districts in proportion. If this scheme doesn't operate as an outrageous "cinch" on the railroad it would mighty hard to figure out one that did.

R. S. Miner leaves for Los Angeles today via Independence and Mojave to attend to the four cases now in the Supreme Court from Inyo county on appeal from Judge Arnot's decisions in the sheep cases tried in that county to test the right of sheep owners to drive sheep to and fro through that county without paying the sheep license tax. There were 37 cases, civil and criminal, brought against sheep owners for refusing to pay their licenses, Judge Arnot deciding them in favor of the county, and these four test cases will be argued before the Supreme Court at Los Angeles on the 14th, Mr. Miner representing Inyo county. The decision in these cases will be anxiously awaited by our people, as they will settle the question of transit—or should settle it.—Bridgeport Chronicle.

Written opinion of the District Attorney presented and read as follows:

OCT. 7th, 1897.

To the Hon. Board of Supervisors: Gentlemen—I have under consideration the legality of a demand of D. Delaney, for the sum of $292 65, purporting to be for "Cash paid for labor and material on county road."

From information received from your honorable body it appears that no authority for making such expenditures was conferred or attempted to be conferred by the Board of Supervisors or the Commissioner of the Road District in which the road referred to is situated; and that said road was not declared a public highway, nor established as such until after such expenditures were made on said road.

Even had the Board of Supervisors attempted to authorize the claimant to expend the moneys claimed to have been expended, "for wire, and right of way," I fail to see how such could become a legal charge against the county, as the necessity of the first, for the use of the county, is not apparent, and expenditures for right of way are authorized by the Board in a regular proceeding for the purpose of laying out a new road or altering an old one, or by the judgment of a court in a condemnation proceeding.

If the labor was done, or material furnished for the improvement of a county road, and at the request of the proper authority, it then would be a legal charge against the county.

The expenditures having been made upon land in which the county had no interest, they could not become a legal charge against the county.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

P. W. FORBES,
District Attorney.

Board adjourned, to meet October 8, 1897, at 8 o'clock a. m.

A. C. FREEMAN, Chairman.

Attest: D. J. HESSION, Clerk.

A Case Without a Verdict

Ballarat has been the scene of one of the most exciting lawsuits on record. In order to thoroughly appreciate the merits of the case, it will be necessary to begin at the beginning. A certain citizen of Ballarat borrowed a worn-out wagon, value about four bits, from a native son known as Indian Charlie. By some untoward means the vehicle became in want of repair, and a dusky son of the native son took it to one of Ballarat's leading smithies to be mended, and thereby hangs a tale. The smith could not collect the bill, and so finally attached the wagon and sued both the native son and the borrower for the sum of $16.50. Interest in the case was most intense; nothing but the case was talked of. A newly imported cook cleared the distance between the kitchen and the court room at one leap, being retained as attorney for the plaintiff. The attorney for the defense demanded a jury trial, and a jury was duly impanelled. Court was held in Pleasant Canyon, probably because all things combined made Ballarat too warm. When the jury filed into the court room and delivered the verdict to the judge, his honor turned to the attorney for the defense and asked: "Have you $13.50 in your jeans to pay the jury?" "No," replied the lawyer, "we do not need it." "Then you cannot have the verdict," said his honor. And thus the case stands. The jury decided in favor of the defense, but the judge refuses to read the verdict; the borrower of the wagon has it again in his possession; the plaintiff's bondsman has to stand the costs; the blacksmith is without his bill, and both he and the bondsman are probably sadder and wiser men.

NEMO.

Judge Conklin.

A telegram to P. H. Mack on Wednesday morning announced the death of Judge A. R. Conklin at San Francisco on Tuesday night. On Monday N. E Conklin and Alvah Conklin were telegraphed for and they left for the city immediately, but arrived too late to see their father alive. No particulars have been received, but it is supposed that death was caused by paralysis. The deceased lived in this county for many years. About eight years ago he was appointed Superior Judge of Kern county and left here for Bakersfield. He was subsequently elected to fill the same position and upon the expiration of his term of office last December he removed to San Francisco, where he died. His wife and four children, all grown, survive him. Judge Conklin was a well known man throughout the State. He was at one time a candidate for Lieutenant Governor on the same ticket with Hon. M. M. Estee and was a past Grand Master of the Masonic fraternity of this State.

C. E. Elliott of Oakland, Cal., and Miss Grace McAfee of Fish Lake, this county, were married in Reno last Tuesday. Mr. Elliott is one of Oakland's most progressive young men, and is a prominent contractor and builder of that place. The bride has spent the greater part of her life in Esmeralda, and is known to nearly all our people as a charming and accomplished young lady.—Hawthorne Bulletin.

A few weeks ago the editor was taken with a very severe cold that caused him to be in a most miserable condition. It was undoubtedly a bad case of la grippe and recognizing it as dangerous he took immediate steps to bring about a speedy cure. From the advertisement of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the many good recommendations included therein, we concluded to make a first trial of the medicine. To say that it was satisfactory in its results, is putting it very mildly, indeed. It acted like magic and the result was a speedy and permanent cure. We have no hesitancy in recommending this excellent Cough Remedy to anyone afflicted with a cough or cold in any form.—The Banner of Liberty, Libertytown, Maryland. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

While news concerning the Randsburg Railway is now always largely discounted, still it is a fact that the enterprise is still going ahead, and there are now six loads of ties coming down the coast for the use of this road, and as soon as these arrive work will be commenced.—Randsburg Miner.

Croup Quickly Cured.

MOUNTAIN GLEN, Ark.—Our children were suffering with croup when we received a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It afforded almost instant relief. This celebrated remedy is for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

A swallow is considered one of the fastest of flying birds, and it was thought until recently that no insect could escape it. A naturalist tells of an exciting chase he saw between a swallow and a dragon fly, which is among the swiftest of insects, the latter finally escaping.

It is stated that animal life appears to be almost absent in the neighborhood of the north pole. Beyond latitude 83 degrees the Fram met with neither whales, seals, walrus nor bears, though dog fishes were seen as high as 85 degrees.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

MISER SCHRAGE.

Most of His Life Spent in Prostration Before His Golden Idol.

The remains of Christopher Schrage, the Chicago miser who was robbed in March, 1896, of $45,000 in money and securities, were interred recently at Whiting, Ind., the home town of his son, Fred Schrage.

C. SCHRAGE.

Life had few attractions for the white-haired economist outside of the strong iron box in which he kept the residual treasures of fifty years. Old age and want, an ill-matched pair, made a piteous plea for the shriveled and starved body of the bondholder, but with all their importunities they could not melt the golden heart of his golden idol.

Of the $45,000 in bonds, securities and money which a cordon of robbers filched from Schrage last year, $30,000 had been recovered, and this fortune fattened in Schrage's safe while the old man starved. For at least a month before his death Schrage had practically abstained from food. Before a protesting body had confined him to his bed he spent much of his time searching the garbage boxes near his hovel at 711½ Jefferson street for morsels of food, and when weakness shut off his last supply he would accept nourishment only from the hand of his friend and tenant, "Patsy" Gurley.

When Gurley entered the room of the miser early one morning he found the old man lying on his back, his limbs distended and the long, yellow fingers of his grimy right hand pointed toward his treasury. A dingy kerosene lamp smoked on a table near by and cast a yellow light on the pallid features of the sleeper. Wearied with watching, the old man had closed his eyes and detailed the bony fingers of his hand to keep vigil over the precious coffer.

The rising sun dispelled the ghastly shadows of the scene and a friend extinguished the yellow light that burned extravagantly at the bedside, but Schrage slept. He will not awake in a world of stocks and bonds.

The story of Schrage's life is a nightmare. His biography is a tale which might well have been told in the days when weazened old hermits lived on roots and herbs and commuted a life of available happiness into the insane glances that periodically they cast into coffers of worthless gold.

Schrage began life seventy-six years ago. He was born in Germany, and when a youth followed the flag of the emperor, coming to America late in the '60s. With the savings of his early days he purchased a tract of land, which is now a part of the site of Whiting, Ind. With his wife's assistance he managed to make a fair success at farming, shipping his produce to Chicago.

Hard work was the first stage of his insanity, and when he arrived in Chicago a few years later, he prepared to emerge into the second stage. He bought a house and rented rooms to lodgers.

With the income he received he made loans in small amounts to his friends and exacted heavy interest.

When his fortune began to assume an air of independence he commenced to cut down expenses. His son and daughter, unable to endure their home surroundings, left for Whiting, Ind., where the former is now successfully engaged in business. The daughter was unhappily married, but was divorced several years ago, and is now the wife of Herman Westenfeldt of Whiting. Nearly five years ago Schrage's wife is said to have died from starvation, but it was not until June, 1895, that the old man met his first real sorrow. That was the occasion on which he was robbed of three watches and $225 in cash.

Shortly afterward he bought an iron box in which he deposited his treasure, but the ill luck followed him, and in March, 1896, he was robbed of $45,000. Schrage never recovered from the shock incident to the second robbery, which apparently had the effect of aggravating his penuriousness.

Of late years he had been in the habit of inspecting his money and bonds night and day, and at times would be found staring like a madman into his strong iron box. Mrs. Fred Schrage, daughter-in-law of the miser, and Mrs. Anna Harms, a friend, made occasional visits to the Schrage hovel, but could not induce the old man to spend a cent for food.

The theft of the bonds became famous owing to the long investigation of the alleged connection with it of Alexander Ross, former assistant chief of police; Ed Smith and others. As the result of the trial of the men indicted for the robbery, among them "Sleepy Burke," all were given their liberty, with the exception of Gordon, who is now serving a term in Joliet under the indeterminate sentence act.

Could See Through His Nose.

Several authors of the sixteenth century mentioned the existence of a man who, having lost his eyesight, could see through his nose. The story, much doubted at the time and pronounced fabulous by physicians, is nevertheless true if the researches of E. Doullot prove correct. It seems that the victim had lost his right eye early in life and later on while climbing a cherry tree fell upon a fence, the pickets horribly mutilating the left eye, the cheek and the nose. The surgeon called in considered the eye entirly destroyed, sewed up the wound and it healed in time, forming a large scar where the eye had been. A year later the man, then considered stone blind, lay in the grass when he surprised himself by discovering that he could perceive through the cavity of the nose the sky and the color of the flowers on the meadow around him. From that time on he practiced for five or six years to see with his nose, which to him became practically the organ of vision. He gradually become more proficient in seeing in this way and could see everything beneath him, while he remained quite insensible to the light from above.

The condition of this man can be explained scientifically. Although the lens of the eye had been torn from its socket by the fall the optic membrane and the nerves at the rear of the cavity of the eye had retained some of the seeing power. When the eye had healed together a small hole in the bone over the nose must have formed, which acted as a lens in the same way as a pin hole can be used to take a photographic picture. This also proves that the retina of the eye acts like a camera obscura where the objects from the outside become visible when the rays of light arrive there after passing through a small opening.—Philadelphia Record.

SURE WAY TO SAVE THE SEALS.

Plan of President Jordan Appears to Be an Effective One.

Last year President Jordan of Leland Stanford University was appointed by President Cleveland to make a thorough and scientific investigation of the habits of the herds, and the causes of their rapid decline, and the results of the study are unusually interesting, especially in the charmingly simple and effective remedy which President Jordan proposes. To insure immunity for the mothers, President Jordan proposes the striking plan of branding the females so thoroughly that they will be practically unavailable for skin hunters' purposes. He and his staff made a careful practical test of this method and found that heavy and ineffaceable brands could be burned across the back of the mother seal, in the parts where the skin is most valuable, without hurting or seriously incommoding the animal. They branded more than 350 animals in their experiments, and he calls into evidence the practice of giving the Aleutian Indians 5,000 seals each year for food—a measure which involved the herding of about 10,000 animals in order that the quota of bachelors might be separated and killed. So much for the mothers and the more important sex; but President Jordan is not inclined to turn the noble army of bachelors over to the tender mercies of the seal hunters. He thinks that it would be feasible to herd up, say, 50,000 bachelors in July, on St. Paul's or St. George's islands, and keep them fenced in during August. Since the climate conditions of Behring Sea confine active operations in the open water to these months the poachers would be at a loss for game sufficient to justify their rather costly paraphernalia with such a number of animals subtracted from the field and with the females unmarketable—and the industry must die.—Scribner's Magazine.

Voyaging to Heathen Lands.

The recent voyage of a certain brig from Boston to the gold coast of Africa, as described for publication by her captain, is interesting reading.

It will doubtless interest the temperance and missionary societies to know that the brig left Boston last fall, laden with 170 hogsheads of rum for the little-known gold coast. Although she took some other articles, most of the profits of the voyage were to come from the rum.

So utterly primeval is this isolated part of the African coast that the cargo hod to be landed through the surf from the vessel. Through some remarkable aboriginal instinct the natives scented the cargo almost before the brig was in sight, and as soon as she was at anchor dove through the waters like hungry sharks.

Among the interesting facts about the African natives related by the captain is that since there are no beasts of burden and no conveyances on the gold coast the barrels of rum are rolled inland by hand, so that liquor has been thus rolled hundreds of miles into the country.

It is further related that the natives have become so infatuated with rum carried from various countries to their coast that a vessel which proposes to have its cargo landed must carry it as currency, or no business can be done. Gold is a depreciated currency, as against rum on this lonely coast.

The wonderful 4,000-mile voyage of this brig to the gold coast with 170 hogsheads of New England rum offers some most interesting suggestions for missionaries and temperance reformers to ponder.—Boston Globe.

Derivation of Names of Dishes.

Gumbo is simply okra soup, gumbo being the name by which okra is often known in the South. Chicken gumbo is soup of okra and chicken.

Macaroni is taken from a Greek derivation, which means "the blessed dead," in allusion to the ancient custom of eating it at feasts for the dead.

Succotash is a dish borrowed from the Narragansett Indians and called by them m'sickquatash.

The sandwich is called for the Earl of Sandwich.

Mulligatawney is from an East India word meaning pepper water.

Waffle is from wafel, a word of Teutonic origin, meaning honeycomb.

Hominy is from auhuminea, the North American Indian word for parched corn.

Gooseberry fool is a corruption of gooseberry foule, milled or pressed gooseberries.

Forcemeat is a corruption of farcemeat, from the French farce, stuffing i. e., meat for stuffing.

Blanc-mange means literally white food; hence chocolate blanc-mange is something of a misnomer.

Charlotte is a corruption of the old English word charlyt, which means a dish of custard, and chocolate russe is Russian charlotte.

A Useful Ant-Eater.

When a horde of hairy yellow caterpillars infested the linden trees at the Zoological Gardens recently, Head Keeper Manley, who is in charge during the absence of Superintendent Brown, was sadly puzzled for a way to get rid of the pests. Poisonous sprinkling mixtures, tar and coal oil were all applied to the trees, but the results fell far short of what had been hoped. The caterpillars flourished in spite of all, and seemed to increase in numbers. Then the ingenious head keeper had a happy idea. He took the South American ant-eater from its cage, and securing it with a collar and a long cord started it up one of the trees. The way the creature laid about with its long, sticky tongue, scooping in caterpillars by the dozen, more than realized Manley's greatest expectations. It took to them with as much relish as though they were its natural food, and in the course of half an hour completely cleaned the tree. Manley put the ant-eater up another tree and it ate until it was gorged. Since then it has been turned out three times a day, and so great have been its industry and appetite that the caterpillars are nearly exterminated.—Philadelphia Record.

PRINCE OF DENMARK AND THE DUCHESS OF MECKLENBURG.

The betrothal of Prince Christian of Denmark and the Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, recently announced, is said to be very pleasing to the German and Russian courts. The lady is second cousin to the present czar and the prince is his first cousin. Both are related by marriage to the royal family of Great Britain. Christian is a stalwart young Dane, second only in stature to the giant Prince George of Greece. He is a superb horseman, an all-around sport, and a fine soldier. His fiancee, the Duchess Alexandrine, is nine years younger than her royal lover. Her father, the reigning Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, is one of the richest of the princes of Germany, and Alexandrine is his eldest daughter. She is a very handsome woman for a European princess and is said to be highly cultured. Foreign court papers, of course, have it that this match is a "genuine love affair."

NATIONAL W. R. C. HOME.

This Magnificent Structure Stands at Madison Ohio.

No charitable institution in the land is more worthy of benefits or gifts from a patriotic people than the Home founded and supported by the National Woman's Relief Corps, at Madison, Ohio, for those whom cruel war left without support or protection.

CLARE H. BURLEIGH

One writing of it says: "It is really one of the wonders of the world. The half has never been told, and you will never realize what a grand institution it is until you visit it."

It is located at Madison, Ohio, on the famous Western Reserve on the line of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. There are now twenty acres of land, five having been purchased last year. There are fine drives, well-kept lawns, with flowers in abundance, besides gardens and orchards. The main building was erected and furnished by the Ohio Legislature at a cost of $35,000. It is known as the "Ohio cottage," and is a model of perfection. It was dedicated on July 17, 1890, with elaborate ceremonies, and turned over to the Woman's Relief Corps. The two original buildings were used for a seminary. Of these one is now fitted up for a hospital. The Home is maintained by a per capita tax assessed on every member of the W. R. C., and by contributions from friends, either cash or supplies. Also a percentage of pensions received by inmates is required of them, to be applied to the support of the Home.

PLUMA L. COWLES.

NATIONAL W. R. C. HOME AT MADISON, OHIO.

There are at present sixty-four inmates, some of them with remarkable war records as army nurses. The oldest is nearly 90, and is in excellent health. Seventeen others are octogenarians.

Mrs. Clare H. Burleigh, the present superintendent of the Home, has exhibited marked ability and tact in caring for aged persons. Bright, cheerful, affectionate, with gifts of speech and song, she has won all hearts, and holds the reins of love and kindness gently, but firmly. She is a descendant of patriots, and is a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution by right of three ancestors—a great-great-grandfather, and two great-grandfathers who fought at Bunker Hill.

Her brother, Mr. George Hoyt, was a recruiting officer for John Brown's company. He later attained a brigadier-general's rank in the Union army, and after the war was appointed attorney-general of Kansas. At the time of her husband's death in 1894 he was a distinguished lawyer and judge of Massachusetts, and judge advocate of the G. A. R.

Mrs. Pluma L. Cowles, the secretary of the Home board, is also a Daughter of the Revolution and wife of Mr. Edwin R. Cowles, a member of the One Hundred and Fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry and a leading church worker and business man of Geneva. She was appointed by the Governor of Ohio, with six others, a member of the Ohio Cottage Building Committee, and has been connected with the management of the Home ever since.

The Board of Directors is composed of Agnes Hitt, national president, Indianapolis, Ind.; Ida S. McBride, national secretary, Indianapolis, Ind.; Annie Wittenmyer, Sanatoga, Pa.; Charity Rush Craig, Viroqua, Wis.; Emma B. Lowd, Salem, Mass.; Margaret Ray Wichens, Evanston, Ill.; Pluma L. Cowles, secretary, Geneva, O.

Everything Inverted.

In Japan—if the bull may be permitted—after-dinner speeches are made before dinner, thus insuring brevity, and furnishing the topics for conversation. In "Feudal and Modern Japan," the author states that it is the absorbing desire of the young ladies to grow old, that they may share the reverence given to age.

The best rooms of the house are in the rear. A Japanese entering it takes off his shoes instead of his hat. If he takes up a book to read, he opens it at the back. He reads from right to left, instead of from left to right. The letters are arranged vertically instead of horizontally. The larger margin of the page is at the top instead of at the bottom, and the foot notes are at the top.

If he writes a letter, he will take a roll instead of a sheet, write along the curve of the roll a missive which begins exactly as one of ours would end, and vice versa, and then putting it into an envelope opening at the end, and addressing it to United States, Ohio, Cincinnati, Smith, John, Mr., he will seal it, turn it over and put his postage stamp on the back.

WRITES JUVENILE FICTION.

Western Author Whose Stories Are Popular with Young People.

Writing juvenile stories so as to interest and hold an army of boys and girls numbering not less than 100,000 week after week and year after year, is a task involving not only skill and judgment, but positive genius. There has come about a vast change in juvenile literature during the past decade.

Eastern publishers say that it is the Western reading field that pays best just now. A Western man holds the palm for juvenile fiction. Weldon J. Cobb has not been known in this line under his own name until quite recently, as the same was controlled by a large Eastern publishing house for exclusive use in the mature field, until some three years since. As Dr. Willard McKenzie, Ralph Hamilton, and Paul Ingelow, however, Mr. Cobb has since 1885 been very prominently before the reading public. To his "Ready Boys" was given the best reception attending any story of its class, while "The Tattooed Boy," which won the Munro prize after the casting of 272,000 votes, was the work of the same author. He is a busy writer, one New York publisher putting out nine books from his pen in a single year.

Mr. Cobb proceeds on the basis that the average boy of to-day is ten times better informed and more critical than the youth of the last generation. One of the best signs of the time is the getting away from the trashy and improbable, and in this work Mr. Cobb has been a crusader. In complete harmony with his readers, he gets very close to their predilections and preferences—in such near touch, indeed, that among the seven hundred odd juvenile athletic and social boys and girls' clubs of the country his name is a household word.

WELDON J. COBB.

Some of this author's best works are "The Oldest Man in the World," "The White Dwarf Elephant," "The Gilded Boy," and his first great story, "Honor Bright," which reached a sale of nearly 200,000 copies. Mr. Cobb resides with his charming wife and two happy children in La Grange, Ill., a beautiful Chicago suburb. He is about 48 years of age, and while rather retiring in his social disposition, seems to understand how to reach the juvenile heart.

Justifiable Doubt.

"No, I never talk to an inferior."

"But have you ever met one?"—Courrier des Etats Unis.

HER LIFELIKE STATUE.

It Signalized Her Departure From the World of Artists.

Before her marriage she had been a famous sculptress. She had made several portrait statues of well known men, and every one predicted for her a still more brilliant future, when she suddenly set all predictions at naught by marrying a wealthy man who disapproved of her keeping up her professional work. She was very quiet under this restriction, but was supposed to rebel inwardly. Therefore when at a dinner party one evening she asked her old friend General Bashar to come to see her on the following evening and inspect her last piece of work, which she thought the best and most lifelike she had ever executed, he supposed he was expected to use his influence to prevail upon her husband to permit her to resume her place among the working fraternity of artists.

"I am sure you will like it, general," she said, with a winning smile. "It fairly lives and breathes. I confess I am in love with it myself."

On the appointed evening the general, with some misgivings over the delicacy of the task intrusted to him, presented himself. Instead of inviting him to the studio his hostess, to his surprise, offered to bring her last bit to him.

"Oh, it's a statuette, is it?" he asked.

"Well, yes, you might call it so," she answered, as she went out of the room. In a few minutes she returned, bearing in her arms—a baby!—Chicago Times-Herald.

Strange Mistake.

Old Mrs. Jones entered the drawing room unexpectedly and spoiled a very pretty tableau.

"I was just whispering a secret in Cousin Jennie's ear," explained Charlie.

"I'm sorry," said the old lady gravely, "that your eyesight has become so bad that you mistake Jennie's mouth for her ear."—London Tit-Bits.

YOUNG GIRLS.

Their Conduct and Health Often Mystifies Their Mothers.

Young girls often feel, and consequently act, very strangely.

They shed tears without apparent cause, are restless, nervous, and at times almost hysterical. They seem self-absorbed, and heedless of things going on around them. Sometimes they complain of pain in lower parts of body, flushes of heat in head, cold feet, etc.

Young girls are not free from incipient womb troubles.

Mothers should see to it that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is promptly taken; all druggists have it. The girl will speedily be "herself again," and a probable danger be averted. Any information on this subject, or regarding all female ailments, will be cheerfully given free by Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass. Write her.

THE TELEGRAPH CORPS AT THE CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE.

THE methods that have been devised to meet the demands for rapid service in telegraphy, have evolved some wonderful results during the past few years, particularly in the field of business. Operators on the various marts of exchange in the great cities have come more and more to rely on electricity as an adjunct of trade, until to-day fully seventy-five per cent. of the transactions of a single day on a representative board of trade or stock exchange are made by wire. So perfect have become telegraphic methods in this particular, that New York was queried from Chicago recently and an answer returned in thirty seconds. The humble citizen who has tried to telegraph his wife at some near suburb that he will not be home to dinner, and who on his arrival about bedtime finds the police looking for him, and is routed out of his comfortable bed several hours later to receipt for the message he filed down town early in the morning, will smile with incredulity when he reads how differently they do things on 'Change. But the demands of the commercial world and the sharp competition of the rival companies have resulted in a system so perfect that "impossible" feats in the race of trade against time are performed on the Board of Trade every day.

At a fair estimate 75 per cent. of the actual transactions on the board are executed on telegraphic orders. Add to these purely "order" messages the mass of gossip in the form of opinions, crop estimates and reports, and advice and market letters, and it is easily seen how the wires are kept hot. The trading on the exchange originates in three ways: Orders are given personally by members present on the floor; they come over leased lines to the so-called "private wire" houses, or over public wires from the floors of other commercial exchanges in different sections of the country. The character of business done demands the greatest possible celerity in every stage of its handling, and for this reason it is generally arranged with the companies to have their instruments and operators close to the trading pits in the various exchanges.

On the Chicago Board of Trade, two completely equipped offices, duplicates of each other in every respect, are used. Fifty-two main line wires center in each, and a force of one hundred operators may be employed on them. These lines radiating from the exchange floor spread out over the country in all directions and bring the principal trading centers under the fingers of the telegraph company's clever young men. Six of the lines take care of the New York business, two of the six terminating on the floor of the produce exchange there, one each tapping the Stock, Cotton and Oil exchanges, and the remaining one working a set of instruments in the main office of the company. Minneapolis, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Buffalo and a few other important cities have two wires each, and the remaining points get along with a single one. The long, narrow operating tables, cutting the space into rows of slender aisles, have the instruments grouped upon them according to the cities they serve, and so contracted are the quarters that the operators' shoulders are wedged together as they sit at their keys.

This company of experts is directly under the chief operator and four assistants. From the opening to the close of business the overseers circulate among the men, watching the message hooks to see that there is no accumulation of business or delay in transmission. Twenty-eight messengers attend to deliveries on the floor, and as the operators are the flower of the office force, so the lads are especially trained for the business and are the brightest to be had. Their preliminary education on the floor involves the acquisition of the knowledge of the personnel of every firm on the board, and they must know personally by name every trader operating in the various pits. If they change from one firm to another the messenger must know it and be careful that messages for the old house do not fall into the hands of the ex-employe.

The business that this force can handle is simply enormous. Most order messages are short—generally under ten words. Three such messages have been handled by a single operator in a minute in the ordinary course of business.

Eighteen hundred messages in the four hours between 9:30 and 1:30 have been handled frequently over the two New York Produce Exchange wires. This is an average of two complete messages a minute for each of the operators. Over the fifty duplexed lines, therefore, if worked to their limit, two hundred messages a minute could be handled. Accuracy is the great thing. A wrong figure might make a difference of thousands of dollars to the sender or receiver of the message, and when one considers the high pressure under which the men work, with scores of sounders about them snapping out, and with a thousand brokers splitting the air with trade jargon yelps, the percentage of error is so small and unimportant as to be hardly worth considering.

Up to a year ago the orders received over the private wires were carried from the private offices to the floor representatives of the firms by a corps of active boys, but lately a group of private telephones was installed in the trading hall, with wires leading to the offices of the private wire houses. Now a mild young man, with an ear muff receiver bolted to his head, sits on a high stool at the telephone, receives the quotations by signal from another employe in the pit, repeats them to his house below and transmits buying orders to traders in the various pits.

A simple system of signals is employed more or less by everyone on the floor, to indicate the fractional fluctuation during active trading. The right hand is used in signaling, each finger and the thumb standing for an eighth of a cent. Two fingers held up represent one-quarter of a cent; three fingers, three-eighths; four fingers, one-half, and with the thumb, five-eighths. With the fingers extended close together and the thumb across the palm, three-quarters is indicated; seven-eighths is shown with the hand closed and the thumb extended at right angles, and the even cent by the closed fist. If the fingers point up the price shown is bid; reversed, pointing down, the figure is asked by sellers.

Where messages are received for points to which no direct wire runs from the floor of the Board of Trade, the same are shot through pneumatic tubes to the main offices of the telegraph company, and thence distributed by messenger boys. The best record on a message and reply, New York, is eighteen seconds. The same record has been made with Minneapolis.

Mistakes are seldom made. One or two curious errors, however, have been due to the similarity of the dots and dashes in numbers and words. One commission man was puzzled by the receipt of a message advising him that "angel cars" had been received consigned to him. The mystery was cleared up when a different division of the dots and dashes in the word "angel" disclosed the figures 170. Another broker was mystified by being wired to ship several cars of grain to J. Bloom Splagent. Knowing no one of that name he started an investigation, and discovered that it was "J. Bloom, spl. agent," to whom he should ship.

An order to buy 10,000 May "cats" caused a good deal of merriment here one morning. Of course it should have been "oats." And a delivery clerk thought he had discovered a new kind of a job when he received a message addressed to "James Gilles, Pie Clerk Steamboat——." Later it was translated to James Gillespie, and reached him on his boat.

Slave Trade in Morocco.

Late accounts from Morocco show that the Moors still carry on slave trading at the very doors of western civilization. A powerful administrator of the Gharb district, named El-Ameen-Oold-el-Dawia, recently purchased three slaves, one of them being a handsome-looking woman of about 27 years, for which this official paid £22. This slave buyer is a persona grata at the shereefian court and makes presents to influential court personages. At times these distinguished courtiers find they possess more slaves than they require, so they send these wretched beings to the "public auction market" in the capital, and generally obtain good prices for them.

Generally the slaves are taken from negro families that have been brought up from their childhood in Morocco, and dealers are continually bringing others from the Soos provinces. At least two dealers journey to Tangier itself twice a year, bringing boys and girls, who are sold privately to the rich Moors of that city. Moorish government officials do not stop this disgraceful traffic through the Soos provinces, nor prevent the sale of slaves in the chief centers of Moorish civilization.

Through the measures taken by the late Sir John Drummond Hay in 1885, while British minister at Tangier, public sale of slaves was forbidden in Tangier city, but public sales of slaves are still allowed in every other place, and even in Tangier, though greatly lessened, sales are regularly effected privately.—London Mail.

FIRST BARBER IN CHICAGO.

Colored Man Who Shaved Lincoln in Early Days Still in Business.

The first barber to open a shop in Chicago is still doing business, although not exactly at "the old stand." He is an aged colored man, Louis Isbell, who came to Chicago and began removing beards and cutting hair in 1838. Although 78 years old, still he has a shop at 335 West Randolph street. Isbell is a fine-looking old man, with long white hair falling almost to his shoulders. He is remarkably spry and active for one of his years. He does not do as much work now as most barbers who run shops, although he is always in his place of business ready to take a hand in case of a rush. He has two barbers working for him and spends most of his time sitting about in the shade thinking of old times, ready to talk of the days when Chicago was young.

The old barber was born in 1819 at Prestonsburg, Ky. He was especially fortunate for one of his race in those days, for he was released from slavery when he was only 5 years old and removed to Paris, Ill. There he lived with his parents until 1838 and there he picked up the rudiments of the barbers' trade. When he began to approach man's estate Isbell decided to leave the little country town in which he was raised and strike out for himself in Chicago. His shop soon became the favorite of all the politicians of that day and in the years in which Isbell was in business there he shaved Abraham Lincoln, who came to Chicago to attend court on several occasions; Stephen A. Douglas, "Long John" Wentworth, General Beaubien, William B. Ogden, Walter Newberry and many other early Chicagoans.

It Stood the Test.

A public writer had a partition wall fixed up in his study and ordered the carpenters to make it in such a way that no sound could penetrate through it.

"The best thing will be to fill it in with shavings," said one man, and set to work.

When he had finished, his employer went and stood on one side of the partition and called out to the man who was on the other side:

"Do you hear me, Jantke?"

"No, sir," was the prompt reply.

Another Kind.

"Light," said the minister, "is the natural symbol of truth."

"How about the light that lies in a woman's eyes?" asked the layman.—Judge.

Poor Eyesight in Schools.

In the public schools of France more than 24 per cent. of the pupils are nearsighted; in those of Germany, 35 per cent.; in those of the United Kingdom, 20 per cent.

No man ever amounted to anything who could answer all the fool questions asked at a school or civil service examination.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

If the word "boom" were not in existence now it would be hard to find a word to fittingly take its place.

"The end of the Ottoman empire is near," the foreign correspondents are saying, just as they did forty years ago.

The roll of membership of the League of American Wheelmen last week footed up 57,025. Of these 7,661 are Pennsylvanians.

In Kansas thrashing an acre of wheat is estimated to cost $1.18, while the housing, after the thrashing is completed, costs 30 cents.

Twenty new paper-making machines are to be added to the New England mills this year, each machine having a capacity of fifteen tons daily.

That flowers are generally beneficial in a sick room, instead of harmful, as formerly supposed, is fully established according to many physicians.

A trout of the Lochleven species weighing 11¾ pounds and measuring 2 feet 7 inches in length and 16¼ inches in girth, was recently taken in Kinghorn Loch.

The favorite team of the Emperor of Germany is a pair of chestnuts, one of which was raised in Susquehanna, Pa. The other came from Binghamton, New York.

"Ink suitable for love letters" is advertised by a Parisian stationer. It is made of a solution of iodide of starch and characters written with it entirely fade in four weeks.

Experiments with plants tend to show that in clear weather the evaporation by night as compared to that which takes place in the day appears to be in the ratio of 1 to 5.

The Japanese are very much alike physically. Recent measurements taken of an infantry regiment showed no variation except two inches in height or twenty pounds in weight.

Compressed food, which has proved a failure in our army, was found useful to the British expedition to Ashantee. The desiccated soup was not damaged by the climate.

Until 1871 there were no shad in Pacific waters. In that year a few thousand were introduced by the United States Fish Commission. Last year the catch sold for nearly $40,000.

The first house built in Southeastern Indiana, and now the oldest house in the State, is still standing at Greensburg. It is the log cabin that was built by Thomas Hendricks, uncle of the late Vice President Hendricks, in 1811.

The latest invention to facilitate field operations is the typewriter bicycle. This consists of a typewriter mounted on a serviceable wheel, which can follow the movements of an army through an ordinary stretch of country.

It is said there is to be a concerted action to do away with the Australian ballot in Maine. By the way it has been manipulated it certainly has not accomplished what its friends claimed for it, and it has been a big bill of expense.

The pranticoles in confinement in the Zoological gardens, London, are announced as once more nesting and the female, which is now sitting on two eggs, is assisted by the male, who relieves her from time to time in her task of incubation.

It has been discovered after numerous experiments that a dark hair is much stronger than a light one. One dark hair can carry a weight of 113 grammes, while a light-colored hair will break if a weight of 75 grammes is hung from it.

The Hampshire, England, county council has issued an order forbidding the taking or destroying of the eggs of the following birds: Common buzzards, honey buzzards, kingfishers, Montagu's harriers, nightingales, owls and woodpeckers.

The very latest flying machine is the invention of a Washington boy, 16 years old, who is believed to have a remarkable talent for this sort of work. He has built a model which flies and which descends easily when the motive power is exhausted.

The total number of excise certificates issued in Brooklyn under the Raines law is 3,667, of which 3,375 are of the first grade. The total receipts were $2,087,088. Exactly 1,035 saloonkeepers have been forced out of business through the new law.

The Katboke and Clambake Clubs are two rather unique organizations of the men of society in Newport. The former is a new feature of the present season, but the latter has before this summer delighted the hearts and tickled the palates of its members.

Stowe house, the residence of the last line of dukes of Buckingham and more recently of the comte de Paris, is offered for sale. Of it Pope wrote to Bolingbroke: "If anything under paradise could set me beyond all earthly cogitations, Stowe might do it."

London's new census shows a population of 4,411,271 for inner London, and of 1,756,421 for outer London, a total of 6,161,692. This idea of having an outer and inner enumeration will be a great boon to Chicago, which will now proceed to snuff out the British metropolis.

For the first time in its history Harvard has conferred the degree of master of arts on a negro. Booker T. Washington is the man honored, and it is an honor worthily bestowed. His great work in education in the South fully entitles him to the very unusual recognition.

The first United States coins bore the likeness of Martha Washington. The general was greatly annoyed and had the die altered, fearing that his political opponents would construe the image on the coin as indicating a desire for royal honors. Our coinage once comprised a $3 gold piece. The authorized act for this coin was passed Feb. 21, 1853, and its coinage was begun in 1854. It is said that very few of these pieces are now in existence.

It is popularly supposed that the sudden downpour which usually follows a bright flash of lightning has in some way been caused by the discharge of the electricity. The most advanced weather sharps are now making experiments which it is believed will prove that the contrary is the exact cause; in other words, that it is the sudden increased precipitation which causes the lightning flash instead of the lightning flash causing the sudden increase of the rainfall.

The keeper of a saloon hotel at 74 Stanton street, New York, was arrested the other Sunday for violation of the excise law. The saloonkeeper was a queer one. A number of bricks were on the bar. One of them bore a placard marked "Ham sandwiches, 10 cents." On another brick was a placard, "Tenderloin steaks $1.70, to order $9." On another was a card, "Cats without teeth, 72 cents; ladies, 71 cents." A fourth brick had a card marked, "Fried dogs, 35 cents; extra, 75 cents." Another was labeled, "Spring chickens, $1.65." A piece of wood bore a card labeled, "Hamburger steak, 40 cents; extra fine, 29 cents."

Nursery Biscuit.

The following recipe for nursery biscuits is taken from Womankind: Nursery biscuits are highly recommended for the younger members of the family. To make them, set a sponge in the usual way, say, with one quart of milk—adding flour to form a stiff batter; let it rise; when raised, add one more quart of milk with four ounces of sugar dissolved in it, also the usual amount of salt. Then, for this quantity, take one pound of arrowroot and then add to it what flour you think will with the arrowroot form a rather stiff dough; add half a pound of butter and rub it in very firm; break down the sponge with the other quart of milk—break it down very fine; then add the flour, arrowroot, etc., and mix. When mixed either knead it very fine or pass it through rollers; let it raise, then knead or break down again, as the dough must be very fine. When again raised, break it up into one-ounce pieces, mold them up nice and clear—overhand molding—set them on a board, wash them with water; then place them on level baking pans, set the pans in boxes, turn another box over them and let them prove up light, but not light enough to fall in the baking. When proved bake in a steady heat; they must be fully baked. When baked, place them away to dry right through—a dry prover would be best—when dry they are ready for use. To use them, put one in a teacup, cover it with lukewarm water; let it remain until plumbed up, then add milk, sugar, honey or what is needed, and with a spoon beat it into a pulp; it is then ready for the infant. If properly made, one of them should "pulp up" and fill a large teacup.

The Conjurer Astonished.

Mr. Charles Bertram, the well-known prestidigitateur, tells some very interesting stories in his recent Reminiscences. Among them he relates how one of his most ingenious tricks had an unexpected ending, more amusing to the spectators than to the performer.

He had borrowed a ring from a lady in the audience, and jokingly requested her to place a value upon it. This she did, assessing it at $20. He then tied a piece of ribbon to it, placed the ring on a plate in full view of the audience, and proceeded to make an omelette.

Having mixed the ingredients, he threw the ring and the ribbon into them, and pouring a little spirits upon them, went through the make-believe of cooking the omelette in a pan.

On setting fire to the spirit there is a blaze, and a lid is placed upon the pan. When the lid is removed, instead of an omelette, a dove is found with the identical ring attached to its neck by a ribbon.

"All went well until I removed the cover of the pan," continues Mr. Bertram. "There was the dove sure enough, with the ring tied to its neck; but during the applause of the audience, the dove flew up, winged its way round the hall, and dashed out of an open window into Piccadilly. I never saw it or the ring again."

The conjurer mournfully adds that he had to make the best of a bad bargain and pay the lady $20 as a compensation for her loss.

City Fathers Go on Strike.

The Austrian government is confronted with a strike of somewhat novel character. So great is the exasperation in the German districts of Bohemia in connection with the recent imperial decree which makes Czech equally with German the official language that the municipalities of a number of important cities and towns have declined to perform any longer the various duties with which they have until now been intrusted by the government, such as, for instance, the collection of certain taxes and the summoning of the army reserve men. The government has responded by dissolving a number of the municipalities, and matters are in such a critical condition that the suspension of the national constitution is being openly discussed as more than probable.

Pay of French Convicts.

Many of the convicts in French prisons are paid for their labor, and earn about one shilling and fivepence a day. Half of this they are allowed to spend for extra food, postage, etc., and the rest is saved, to be given to them on their discharge.

There is at least this to be said in favor of this hot weather: We are not troubled with Klondyked feet.

EDWARD HANLAN TEN EYCK.

Fastest Sculler of His Age America Has Ever Produced.

Young Edward Hanlan Ten Eyck, who at Henley splashed to victory in the Diamond Sculls, the single scull championship of the world for amateurs, represented Massachusetts in the big English regatta. His triumph did not please the British because of the suspicions of semi-professionalism that attach to him. Ten Eyck is unquestionably the fastest sculler of his age ever produced by America. He won his first and junior race at the regatta on the Charles River, July 4, 1895, and in 1896 he was the winner of the national intermediate championship at Saratoga. In that event his time was faster than that made in the senior race, and this led to his match with the champion, Whitehead, in the following October. He carried off the senior championship of New England on Labor Day last year, and rowed away from Whitehead in October at Lake Quinsigamond. Ten Eyck is still a schoolboy. He is but 18 years old, but is marvelously developed for a lad of that age. His attitude and action in a shell are the very poetry of sculling, and veterans say they never saw a smoother or more masterful oarsman handle the blades. He is an American all the way through. Born upon the banks of the Hudson at Peekskill, he was, one may say, reared upon the water. His grandfather was a ferryman, and his father, the noted professional oarsman, first learned to handle the sculls on the same stream. He measures about 5 feet 8½ inches and weighs, when in condition for rowing, about 162 pounds. He was trained for the event which he has just won by his father. The question of his amateur standing was brought up by a man from Worcester, who was persuaded to withdraw his objection. The Diamond Sculls were offered years ago and made a perpetual prize which nobody can win outright. Each year a solid gold bar, inscribed with the winner's name, is added to the sculls. That is all there is in it for the winner so far as the sculls are concerned. Ten Eyck will receive a handsome silver cup as a token.

LOVE OF ADVENTURE, NOT GOLD

Wealthy Young Chicago Widow Has Gone to Alaska Gold Fields.

It is not a love of gold, but a love of adventure, which impelled young Mrs. A. W. Little, of Chicago, to start for Alaska. She was born and reared in the cradle of luxury. Her slightest wants have all been gratified since she was a child. In society she was a favorite. Her friends include some of the richest and most influential persons in Chicago, Boston and elsewhere. She is now endowed with money and position. But sweetness has palled on her taste. She is determined to leave luxury behind, and brave the hardships of frontier life—merely for a change, for the benefit of her health, and to occupy her mind. For, although still young, Mrs. Little has for a year been a widow, and the ordinary life of civilization seems empty to her.

MRS. A. W. LITTLE.

"I am going up there," she said before starting, "just to see the country and watch frontier life while a gold excitement is at its height. I feel it is the experience of a lifetime, and in spite of the hardships I am anticipating it with eagerness. I do not intend to stake out a claim or anything of that sort, although I may get the fever after I reach there. I am makng plans to enjoy myself. I have bought a kodak and ordered my dogs and sledges to be ready when I get there. I shall stay just as long as I feel like it."

Chinese Playing Cards.

A pack of Chinese playing cards is a genuine curiosity. They are generally printed in black on thin cardboard, the average width being about that of the finger of the human being. In some cases they are only a half inch broad and about three and a half inches in length. The length, whatever the size, is always at least six times that of the width.

Some of the packs have queer representations of our "kings" and "queens" and "knaves" stamped upon them in black; others are decorated with the figures of animals, birds and fishes.

The United States Supreme Court has rendered an opinion against the railroad in the case of the Southern Pacific Railway Company vs. the United States, sent to Washington from the Ninth circuit. The case involved about 700,000 acres of land in Southern California, and grew out of the fact that the forfeited land grant of the Atlantic & Pacific Railway Company was overlapped to some extent by lands claimed under Government grant by the Southern Pacific. The Atlantic & Pacific Company originally claimed the lands in controversy, and its original maps of location along the line of these lands were accepted by the Land Office, but Congress declared the lands forfeited, and thereupon the Southern Pacific, whose grant overlapped that of the Atlantic & Pacific, set up title to the lands. The Circuit Court, however, decided against the Southern Pacific, and the Supreme Court has affirmed that decision so far as concerns the railroad company, but remanded to the lower court for decision the case of about 100 persons who had purchased part of the lands from the railroad company.

Justice Stephen J. Field, of California, after a term of over thirty-four years, has retired from the United States Supreme Court. Although his resignation does not take effect until the 1st of December, it is known that he will not resume his seat on the bench during the interim. If, in any case, Field ever joined in an opinion adverse to the money powers the fact is not generally known. The President has determined that Attorney-General McKenna, also of this State, will be nominated for the Supreme bench unless some cause intervenes between now and December to prevent it. This accords with precedent both ways and gives President McKinley an opening for the reorganization of his Cabinet generally, with the probable retirement of Secretary Sherman.

The sixth great annual convention of California miners is under way at San Francisco, with Inyo unrepresented as usual—an inexcusable neglect of our own interests that might have been easily and ably met by asking Senator Reddy to appear for this county. The program includes discussion of river improvements and restraining dams; a Federal Department of Mines; Revision of the Federal mining law and co-operation with other mining States therefor; the mineral lands bill; the Mining Bureau; the next international gold mining convention; working low-grade ores; electricity in mining; a California mining exhibit at the Paris Exposition. The State Miners' Association is doing good work.

The story, duly verified by the Walker Lake Bulletin, is told of a Carson minister that a member of his congregation, named Helen Hunt, picked up a small bible lying in the aisle of the church one Sunday morning. As there was nothing in the book to indicate to whom it belonged, she spoke to the pastor and suggested that he announce the fact of her find on the following Sunday. He did it in this way: "The person who lost a small bible in flexible cover, in the main aisle at last Sunday's service can go to Helen Hunt for it." Then he wondered why the people smiled.

The boom cry of one of Colorado's once most noted mining towns was: "It's day all day in the daytime, and there is no night in Creede." Per contra, the last refrain from the great White Pine excitement was: "It's a woild night on Treasure Hill, and Mulligan's busthed!" Pike's Peak "busted" many an outfit, but wait till you read about Dawson—sometime next summer.

The political campaign in Nebraska promises to become very warm. Mr. Bryan, who has thus far only made occasional speeches in the State, has started out to make a thorough canvass, speaking twice a day at various places in the State until the close of the campaign Mr. Bryan thinks the situation has steadily improved for the silver forces in Nebraska.

Marshal Blanco has started from Madrid for Cuba to begin the work of pacification. No money will be spared to buy off the chiefs of the insurrection and for such honorable warfare as that. Some of the Cubans are talking about anexation to the United States, a la Haiwaii. But Spain is evidently bent on doing something before the American Congress meets.

When an officer was killed while apprehending a stage robber and while lead was needed from his gun, Detective Thacker, of the Wells-Fargo corps, got to one side. He appears to appreciate the philosophy of the thought that a live official has more opportunities before him than a dead hero.

Mr. Nye and another Bodie man have purchased the naptha launch Comet from Bryson & Cohn of Carson. It was hauled to Bodie and will be placed on Mono Lake. The price is said to be $350, although the boat originally cost over $1,000.

Admiral John L. Worden, who commanded the Monitor during its engagement with the Merrimac, died in Washington October 18th.

As applied for, the United States Supreme Court has advanced the argument of the Durrant murder case and set it for hearing November 15th.

ADDRESS OF PAST GRAND ORATOR JACOB VOORSANGER AT THE OBSEQUIES OF M. W. ALVAH RUSSELL CONKLIN, PAST GRAND MASTER OF MASONS, IN MASONIC TEMPLE, SAN FRANCISCO, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1897.

Most Worshipful Grand Master and Brethren of the Grand Lodge: It is said that at the obsequies of the Emperors of Austria a peculiar proceeding is witnessed by the mourners. Three times will the priests ask admission, the first time on behalf of his Imperial Majesty, the Emperor Francis Joseph; and I am told that admission is refused. The second time the solemn knocks at the door of the mausoleum are given and admission is asked on behalf of the Emperor Francis Joseph, and again it is refused. The third time weeping mourners ask admission for Francis Joseph, a fellow mortal, and instantly the doors are opened and the ashes received. So, Most Worshipful Grand Master and Brethren of the Grand Lodge, and friends all assembled, it seems to me that the most fitting tribute of obedience and submission that, as Masons, we can pay to-day to the Supreme Architect of the Universe is to ask admission to the Grand Lodge above, not for Grand Master Conklin, but for our brother, our fellow mortal, Alvah Russell Conklin, shorn of all his titles, returning to his God just as he came. It seems to me, brethren, that that is the most important lesson of the day. We who are accustomed to the thought that life is a gift from heaven, we who are under the instruction and guidance of the Worshipful Master in the East, seeing him illustrate by precept and example the transient nature of human life—we who understand and know that it is within the design of an Almighty God to give and to take; to open the doors of our lodge room and to close them again; to put the evergreen at the door of each family that he selects—it behooves us, as fellow mortals and Conklin's brethren who knelt together before the same altar to say, as we should, His will, not ours, be done. And if it happens, as it happens to day, that instead of the common soldiers who fall on the battlefield they who lead the cohorts are called first in order to give an account of themselves, even then it behooves us, as men who believes that He is just, to say again: Thy will be done.

And now, Most Worshipful Grand Master, since we are here in the midst of these gloomy surroundings and the pall of death is near us and the tear of grief is hanging upon the eye of fifteen thousand Masons, may we not ask once again: What is the character of this masonry that guides man through life and accompanies him with a loving heart to his everlasting home? The answer will come again, as it always must come: The test of masonry is not the trappings and adornments of office; nor does it consist of high titles or high sounding praise; the test of masonry is character, righteous lives, noble deportment, high citizenship, walking justly, acting kindly and walking with God so far as one may. Anyone who understands masonry differently understands it wrongly. Both the condition and the reward of a Mason are his own life. To his brethren the surest and safest teaching, the best testimony of his integrity is his life itself. And therefore are we today mourning because of the gone-out life of our departed Past Grand Master. His life was his masonry; his character was his degree; his deportment and his humanity, they were his titles to his high office; he, as little as we, care aught for the trappings that surround us. Among us all perhaps he was the one whose philosophy was deepest in this respect. I, who associated with him while he was Grand Master, can testify to this fact. Humble he was, as if he were but the commonest apprentice, just led within the Temple to learn his craft. Modest he was, like the humble bearers of burdens who, in days of yore, obediently carried out the instructions of their master masons. In all things considering not himself, but only the honor and wellfare of the organization that for the time being was confided to him, the simple lesson of masonry illustrated by a noble life, and he understood and taught it often. He taught it by precept and example, that the fruit of man lies not in the reputation the world is pleased to give him for his efforts, but in the inward character, in the deportment, in the walking before God and man, and, brethren, so much testimony we place upon the bier of Alvah Russell Conklin, with our hearts' affections and our benisons, to go with him beyond the grave. He was in all respects a man. The elements were so mixed in him perhaps that nature would stand up and pronounce his high title to manhood. We understand these things when we are among ourselves, and these are the times when we can communicate these mysteries of masonry to the world at large. The highest title of a Mason is to be a Man. Brother Conklin's title consisted in having served his God, his country and his fellow men. Brother Conklin's high position as a Mason was not made high by honors conferred upon him by his brethren, but by the character he exhibited in his deeds, by his loyalty and patriotism to his country in the time that tried the souls of its citizens; by the most exemplary conduct as a kind husband, father and relative, and in all things by exhibiting that loving kindness that proves to his brethren that the seat of God is in the hearts of men; and I thank my maker that I know my friend Conklin to be so created.

And so, brethren, we may say to-day to the widow of our departed brother, and we may extend these salutations to all who are mourning and grieving for him, that fifteen thousand Masons in California sincerely grieve because one of the illustrious leaders of the cohorts has been called up to the Grand Lodge above; one of the chiefs of our profession, one who sat in the East; one from whose lips came words of wisdom; one who led us in paths of rectitude; one whose example was strength to guide his brethren into avenues of true happiness and piety. Because in his coming and his going there was the brilliant writing of one of God's angels who wrote him down as one who loved his fellow man. And therewith he must depart; the Lodge is called up; the signs of salutations are given; he departs in peace for the Grand Lodge above, where there are neither passwords nor mysterious emblems; where every white soul comes before its God, with only one pass-word, the test of rectitude on earth. So he enters before his God with confidence; and in the grave shall his mortal remains abide until the resurrection. Thence shall, from season to season, as the earth receives again the rays of God's sun, sprout forth those gentle flowers which no Mason who has the sprig of acacia in his bosom regards in vain, for they are symbols that nothing dies, but that everythiag in God's time shall bloom again. But to Masons particularly that is a sign that men like Conklin never wholly pass away. Though the earth holds their remains; though their souls depart for heaven, their memories, their deeds live forever. And as the Grand Lodge of California meets from year to year those choice spirits rise up in its midst and though they shall not speak again their presence in our hearts shall be eloquent, for though men pass away their deeds live after them, and in the temple of posterity there is a niche for every noble life. Let me say again: The noblest test of masonry is character, and the reward of life is fife itself. Conklin was such a Mason and therefore he ranks amongst our noblest chiefs.

Madame, the Grand Lodge of California mourns with you, his children and his relatives; our pain is like yours. We mourn with you and we pray to the Grand Master above that solace and consolation and comfort may come to you as time grows older and as you will be better able to understand the wise designs of the Omnipotent Merciful in life and in death. We tender you our most affectionate salutations, as the relict of one whom we honored in life and regret in death, and before you, at the bier of their departed leader, the Masons of California deposit a wreath of immortelles—a loving token that his memory shall not die in our midst.

J. White Smith returned to Bishop this week from Los Angeles.

L. W. Barnabey and J. C. Crocker of Big Pine were here yesterday.

Messrs. McPherson and Woodworth came down from Bishop last Monday.

Hay commands $30 per ton in the Panamint region, and grain from $45 to $50.

Philip Gehrig is making preparations to put up a large quantity of ice this winter.

Charley Anthony, of Darwin, is at Highland Springs, Lake county, "nursing his game leg."

The prospects are very favorable for a sale of the Curran mines in Jail Canyon, Telescope range.

Attorneys Vermilyea and Doyle of Bishop were in town last Monday on legal business.

Charles and John Collins passed southward yesterday with a band of fifty horses for the Los Angeles market.

D. M. Rogers and Willie Calloway are in from "the desert," buying hay and stock for the Garlock & Ballarat stage line.

Chicago people are negotiating for the purchase of the Radcliffe group of mines, on the summit overlooking Pleasant Canyon.

Miss M. V. Doss, late of Aberdeen, is teaching school at Garlock. Kern county gets its new schools organized quicker than does Inyo.

The young people of Fish Springs have united to establish a Sunday School. The meetings are held in the school house at 3 p. m. every Sunday.

It is reported here that Supt. Hoskins has found some very rich ore in the Hirsh mine and that he is taking out more gold than when he had a much larger force at work.

The Inyo county sheep license cases were submitted in the Supreme Court on the 14th instant. The sheepmen were not represented at the argument. A decision is expected in about ninety days.

Horace Bellows, a robust pioneer of Indian-war days and goat-king of the Haiwai Meadows, paid a business visit to Independence on Tuesday last. He says that the mountain range is dried out and that it is doubtful whether late storms will result in much benefit.

Mr. Ryan, who has a bond on some copper mines in Ubehebe Dirtrict, will arrive here to-dayon his way to re-examine the property. The present developments show a large vein of good grade copper ore carrying considerable gold.

T. B. Pheby is having a fifty-ton working test made of the ore from Tuba Canyon at the 3-stamp mill at Postoffice Springs. His company has ordered steam hoisting works and will prosecute work on the mines with a large force as soon as the machinery is in place.

Inyo County local papers "never have anything in them," but it's a terror of a job for a regular subscriber to keep track of his copy thereof. The people who fail to get a number that they did want so bad, and also fail to pay for any, always have the sympathy of the publishers.

The Panamint Country.

From parties recently in from Panamint Valley we learn the following notes of local interest:

The little mill at Ballarat, now in charge of Wm. Rudick, is running day and night on large "sample" lots of ore from all over the country, the same being hauled in by Calloway & Rogers' teams.

Pheby and Donahue are pushing things generally. Their principal mine at Tuba Canyon is opened by shaft 125 feet, and sinking suspended while a hoist is being put in. Near, or some distance below, the mouth of Jail Canyon, Shepherd & Wood have a stream of five or six miner's inches of water, which the Tuba Mining (Pheby's) Company are negotiating for, and if they get it reduction works will probably be located there. Some fifty tons of their ore has been satisfactorily tested at the Ballarat mill.

Ginser has sold his claims at Mineral Hill to Mr. Cross, who is engaged in development work.

W. H. Hickey has gone to Santa Barbara, having sold out his Postoffice Springs property to Wm. Jenkins of this place. Mr. Jenkins started from here last Tuesday with two loads of supplies and a small bunch of beef cattle.

The Montgomery mill in Pleasant Canyon is doing some custom work, but running mostly on ore from the company mines, taken out under a sort of tribute system.

Claim owners at Shepherd Canyon, in the Argus Range, including Davis, Rich, White, Hickey, McLaughlin and others, have out about 250 sacks of good ore ready for shipment across the valley to the mill at Ballarat.

Notes from the Los Angeles Fair.

Several Inyo people are taking in the festivities at Los Angeles.

John Barlow and his daughter Ella, John Underwood, J. White Smith, Fred C. Scott, R. S. Miner and Mrs. Emma Roberts and her daughter Eva are in town. The weather is beautiful, and all anticipate the best race meeting of the year.

The Mojave desert is quite lively near the mining camps. John McSweeny is driving a 20-mule team between Mojave and Mountain Springs, hauling for the Wilson mine at that place. George Lewis makes his headquarters at Mojave.

A few apples brought from Inyo have created quite a sensation among fruit dealers here. A good apple is the scarcest article to be found in this land of the citrous fruit. Our farmers could doubtless dispose of their winter apples at a good price in this market.

The Kramer-Randsburg Railroad is an assured fact. Two hundred teams are at work at Kramer and the contract will be finished by the 25th of November. This will mean a railroad to Keeler in the near future and a great change for Inyo county.

Fish Springs School Report.

Report of Fish Springs public school for month ending Oct. 15, 1897, Miss M. M. Gregory, teacher: Number of boys enrolled, 2; girls, 7; total, 9. Percentage of attendance, 91. Roll of Honor—Alice Jones, Mary E. Connor, Enid Peterson, Eva Jones, Nellie Lane, Maud Lane. Enid Peterson deserves special mention for perfect attention.

The case of the People vs. Wah Lee, the Chinaman accused of shooting Mrs. Gall at Darwin, was called for trial before Judge Lamar last Tuesday morning. District Attorney Forbes appeared for the prosecution and attorneys Richard S. Miner and F. E. Densmore for the defendant. The following jury was secured Wednesday morning: Wm. Boyd, Fred Schabbell, Wm. J. Lake, Wm. F. Matlack, H. D. Gill, D. Stubblefield, P. Laberge, H. Glade, H. Fehrman, G. W. Brady, John Keegan and J. E. Shepherd. The trial had not closed up to the hour of going to press.

A few weeks ago the editor was taken with a very severe cold that caused him to be in a most miserable condition. It was undoubtedly a bad case of la grippe and recognizing it as dangerous he took immediate steps to bring about a speedy cure. From the advertisement of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the many good recommendations included therein, we concluded to make a first trial of the medicine. To say that it was satisfactory in its results, is putting it very mildly, indeed. It acted like magic and the result was a speedy and permanent cure. We have no hesitancy in recommending this excellent Cough Remedy to anyone afflicted with a cough or cold in any form.—The Banner of Liberty, Libertytown, Maryland. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, Sec.

A Typical New England.

Indian Ridge, says Alvan F. Sanborn, speaking of a typical New England community in The Atlantic, has all the defects of all its qualities, and possibly some others besides. It is narrowly partisan in its politics; gossiping and meddling in its temper toward matters of purely private concern; religion, here as elsewhere, in spite of a general wholesomeness, is not entirely free from hypocrisy, morality from inhumanity and self complacency, integrity from cruel hardness, nor thrift and foresight from parsimoniousness and worry. It is very little alive to the finer issues of country living. Most of them are not so much as suspected by it. For all the mutual helpfulness and abounding sense of humor, the life lacks flexibility, mellowness, warmth, emotion and emotional expression. It is indisputably triste.

Nevertheless Indian Ridge exemplifies the best tendencies of the New England country. These tendencies, owing to its comparative isolation, have been manifested in unique and homely ways in some instances, but the tendencies are none the less sound and healthy on that account. They are present to a considerable if not an equal degree, not in all, not in the majority, perhaps, but in many of the rural communities in every one of the New England states. If all instead of a small part of these communities were even thus liberally endowed, there could be no plaint over the decadence of rural New England, for they have in them the germs of permanent progress. Rather they are themselves the very essence of corporate life.

Harnessing the Ether.

Tesla once made a remark which was full of the spirit of future progress in the matter of lighting. "It is of not little interest," he said, "to contemplate that we have a possible way of producing—by other than chemical means—a veritable flame which would give light and heat without any material being consumed, without any chemical process taking place, and to accomplish this we only need to perfect methods of producing enormous frequencies and potentials."

These words of Mr. Tesla contain a suggestion the full meaning of which has lately been more thoroughly understood. To produce something from nothing has ever been a great human problem not always solvable. Here is a scientist pointing out a scientific way of accomplishing the feat. The hidden meaning of the remark is not hard to discern. His words would seem to intimate that we have been employing exceedingly crude methods of light production; that in the laboratory of nature means and material exist which may be procured and used for the mere asking; that our proper course would be to first see how light is produced in nature, and then as far as possible to go and do likewise. The harnessing of the ether means the solution of many great secrets of the universe, the utilization of natural light, the subtle transmission of speech through miles of space, and the greatest triumph science has yet known.—Theodore Waters in Exchange.

Suicide.

An English statistician says there is not much of a psychological mystery in the fact that so many more people commit suicide in summer than in winter, and he does not think that the difference is in any large measure due to the direct effect of cold upon human minds and bodies. It must be borne in memory, he says, that drowning is the commonest method of self destruction and resort to it is difficult or impossible when rivers and ponds are covered with ice. This accounts for a part of the decrease. Another part is explained by the circumstance that in cold weather people live more in association, and there is thus less opportunity for committing suicide. He does not think, however, that it is possible to explain the matter wholly without reference to the depressing effects of cold on the nervous system and the exciting effects of heat. It requires some energy and determination to commit suicide, and this is lacking in a person suffering from extreme cold. All these considerations working together, the result is that many people endure through the winter a life which they have ceased to value and throw it away when the season comes in which the material difficulties in the way of continued existence are at their minimum.

All the Same.

At one of our large north country churches recently a fashionably dressed lady happened to go into one of the private pews.

The verger, who is known to be a very stern old chap, immediately bustled up to her and said:

"I'm afraid, miss, you'll ha'e to cum out o' that. This is a paid pew."

"Sir," said the young lady, turning sharply round, "do you know who I am? I'm one of the Fifes."

"I dinna care," said the old man, "if you are the big drum, you'll ha'e to cum out."—Edinburgh Scotsman.

A Critic of Durer.

A woman visitor to the Durer collection on exhibition in New York had the present day assurance to criticise this old master as follows: "One can but notice how modeling, at least, has grown into an exact science, and what a difference there is between such figure drawing as Durer's and that of any bright young art student nowadays. Why, the flesh seems to hang in bunches upon his nudes. One would think that they were all afflicted with tumors."

One of the British Medical association delegates contends that every cow should be examined by a veterinary surgeon and marked before being admitted to the dairy and its milk sold.

It appears from the testimony of Gervas, the monk of Canterbury, who flourished about the year 1200, that organs were introduced more than 100 years before this time.

Window plants should not be taken out to the garden and syringed with cold water when in bloom. It will check the flowers and may destroy them altogether.

Li Hung Chang was over six feet in height before age bowed his head and bent his shoulders. His left eye is partially closed by a paralytic stroke.

It is not too much to say that in Britain a million of money might be saved annually on funeral and marriage ceremonies with no disrespect to the dead and an increase of comfort to the living.

DO WE NEED BIG MUSCLES?

By no means. Persons of herculean build frequently possess a minimum of genuine vigor, and exhibit less endurance than very small people. Real vigor means the ability to digest and sleep well, and to perform a reasonable amount of daily physical and mental labor without unnatural fatigue. It is because a course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters enables the enfeebled dyspeptic to resume the allotted activity of every day life, as well as to participate without discomfort in its enjoyments, that it is such a pre-eminently useful medicine.

"Whatever made you make Brackins a present of a pocket-comb? He's as bald as a billiard ball." "That's just it. I wanted to make him think I never noticed it."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

AN OPEN LETTER TO MOTHERS.

We are asserting in the courts our right to the exclusive use of the word "CASTORIA," and "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," as our Trade Mark.

I, Dr. Samuel Pitcher, of Hyannis, Massachusetts, was the originator of "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," the same that has borne and does now bear the fac-simile signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on every wrapper. This is the original "PITCHER'S CASTORIA" which has been used in the homes of the mothers of America for over thirty years. Look Carefully at the wrapper and see that it is the kind you have always bought, and has the signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on the wrapper. No one has authority from me to use my name except The Centaur Company of which Chas. H. Fletcher is President.

CHEAP IRRIGATION.

The Hercules Gas Engine Works of San Francisco, Cal., the largest builders of gas, gasoline and oil engines on the Coast, are making extensive preparations for the season's business.

They are filling several orders for large irrigating plants and as this line of their business increases each season, it is safe to say the farmers throughout the State are appreciating the advantages of irrigation with water pumped by this cheap power.

The Hercules Works are at present building an 80 H. P. engine for Geo. F. Packer, Colusa, which will raise 6000 gallons per minute from the river and distribute it over his land. This will be the largest gasoline pumping plant in existence.

Her Point of View.

They were discussing the construction of a new gown.

"From a hygienic point of view and merely as a matter of health," suggested the dressmaker, "I think it should be made"—

The haughty beauty stopped her by a gesture.

"Hygienic point of view!" she exclaimed. "Matter of health! What has that to do with it? When I want health, I will go to a doctor. When I want style, I come to you. We will now eliminate all absurdities and discuss this purely from a common sense standpoint. Will it be fashionable and becoming?"—Philadelphia Times.

THE VOICE OF THE CHARMER.

I.

"UPON my word it's too bad!" exclaimed Mr. Mainwaring, as having wished everybody good-morning he sat down to the breakfast table, and proceeded, before commencing that meal, to glance through his letters according to custom. "It really is too bad!" he repeated, crimsoning with indignation, and giving an angry stamp of his foot, in so doing treading on the foot of Jumbo, his wife's pet pug, and causing that much-pampered animal to give utterance to a loud yell, and retreat further under the table to the shelter of his mistress' petticoats.

"My dear," said Mrs. Mainwaring, pausing in the act of pouring out the squire's coffee, "what is the matter now? Nothing wrong with Sunbeam's little foal, I trust."

"No, thanks, my dear, not so bad as that," answered her husband, "but quite bad enough, in all conscience. It's that dreadful fellow Wilder, at the Lea farm, again. I wish to goodness he had never come near the place, with all my heart."

"Horrid man," agreed Mrs. Mainwaring. "I can't bear the sight of him. What has he done now, dear?"

"Done?" exclaimed her husband. "Why, stuck up barbed wire all over his farm, to be sure, and refuses to remove it on any pretense whatever, so Higgins writes me word.

"Here we have the hounds coming here on Thursday, and they find in Nightingale wood, as they are perfectly certain to do, for I know for a fact there are two or three foxes there, they are equally certain to run right across his land, and a pretty kettle of fish will be the result.

"Half the hounds maimed, and men and horses tumbling about in every direction."

"Oh! I can't bear the thoughts of it!"

"I shall simply have to ask Hartopp not to draw there, and a pretty fool I shall look. I really don't know what to do about it."

"Why not go and see the man yourself, and try and bring him to reason?" suggested his wife. "Surely, my dear, he would listen to you."

"Listen to me?" ejaculated the squire. "Not he. Besides, I know perfectly well what would be the result. He would meet my arguments with some of his republican sentiments, and I should lose my temper and make a fool of myself."

"Well," sighed his wife, "it's a very great pity, I'm sure. I only wish I knew what was best to be done. But never mind now, dear," she added, soothingly, "get on with your breakfast, and then afterward you can speak to Higgins again on the subject, and perhaps you will be able to devise some plan between you for bringing this horrid man Wilder to reason."

"And, pray, who may this horrid man Wilder be?" inquired a young and very pretty girl, who at this juncture entered the room and sat herself down at the breakfast table, after kissing both Mr. Mainwaring and his wife lovingly and wishing them "good-morning."

The squire looked affectionately into the fair questioner's face ere he answered her.

"Don't ask me, Gladys," said he laughingly; "don't ask if you love me. He has already spoiled my breakfast for me, and I feel perfectly certain that were I to tell you all about him he would spoil yours, and that would be a great pity, eh, my pretty niece?"

"It would, indeed," retorted the girl, "for I have such an appetite as never was. Joking apart, though, I am really curious, Uncle William," she continued, "so I will compromise with you—eat my breakfast first and you shall tell me afterward. Don't you think that a very fair arrangement, sir?"

The squire agreed at once to the terms, as, indeed, he would have to anything proposed by his favorite niece.

The only child of his one sister, lately dead, Gladys Onslow had taken up her permanent abode at Charlton Towers only three weeks ago, during which short period she had managed to convert every individual member of the establishment into being her devoted slave, including her uncle and aunt, who, childless as they were, quite looked upon her as their daughter.

As for the squire, he was perfectly helpless without her, and Miss Gladys was his constant companion wherever he went.

He declared she was a better judge of stock than his bailiff himself, and as for her knowledge of horseflesh, who was there about the place who could compete with her? And how she rode too! Many and many a time, when accompanying his niece in her rides, did her uncle regret that his salad days were over, and that he was no longer able to pilot her over this place and that, instead of looking on from the broad back of his favorite cob while she larked about at her own free will, for she was uncommonly fond of riding over a country, was Miss Gladys.

As her groom said, "The fence was never made yet that could stop his young lady when the hounds were running."

True to his promise, after breakfast the squire unbosomed himself to his niece with regard to his refractory tenant at the Lea farm—"the only farm, by the way, my dear," he added, "where I have not introduced you, for the very good reason why, because I have such a strong personal dislike to its tenant. I even avoid shooting over the place as much as possible, because I can't bear the sight of the fellow. Just fancy, my dear, afraid even to walk over my own property—my own property, forsooth. Nasty, cantankerous wretch!" wound up the squire in his wrath. "I wish somebody would knock him on the head. I do, indeed!"

"Fie, for shame, sir!" exclaimed his niece, laughing, putting her pretty hand over his mouth as she spoke.

"And his name is Wilder?" she continued, "and I knew such a dear old man of that name years ago—he was one of poor papa's tenants, indeed.

"I wonder now," she mused, "could it be the same man? He left to go to Australia, so I understood—for I was only a little girl at the time. And we were such friends, too!

"Uncle," exclaimed the girl, a flush of excitement coming over her face, "if you don't mind I will ride over this morning and see for myself.

"If it is the same man—and I have a very great idea it is, do you know—I will undertake that every bit of that horrid wire fencing is taken down between this and to-morrow morning. Say, I will even have a bet with you on the subject. Come, sir, what odds will you give me?"

"I won't bet. I utterly decline to bet, you little gambler," returned her laughing uncle, "for I hate losing money, but I will tell you what I will do, my Gladys, if you only succeed in your undertaking, I will give you the very best hunter or the prettiest bracelet that can be bought for money. I believe it's a real 'good thing' for you, too, you minx, you," he added, pulling her ear, "for now I come to think of it I believe I did hear that this objectionable tenant of mine had been in Australia before he came down here to sit upon my shoulders like the old man of the sea."

"Don't say another word, dear uncle," cried Miss Gladys. "I haven't my betting book about me, so I seal the bargain with this kiss (suiting the action to the word), and now I'm off to put my habit on and order my horse."

"Good-by, dear, we shall meet again—not on the Rialto, but at luncheon," and bestowing another kiss on the enraptured old gentleman the lively girl rushed from the room.

II.

The stable clock was just striking half-past 1, simultaneously with the rumbling of the gong announcing the fact that luncheon was ready, as Gladys Onslow with her attendant groom came cantering through the park.

The squire, who had been waiting for her for the last half hour, seized a hat and rushed hastily out into the stable yard, where he knew she would dismount, to await her coming with mingled feelings of delight at her return, and curiously to know how she had succeeded on her mission of diplomacy with his refractory tenant.

"Here I am, uncle, safe and sound, you see, and I've had, oh! such a lark! Brilliant's legs are full of thorns, I fear, poor dear," exclaimed happy Gladys, her face flushed with pleasure and excitement, and looking prettier than ever.

Off her horse she jumped in her accustomed impetuous fashion, and, having administered her usual hug, she took her uncle's arm and ordered him to take her in to luncheon at once.

"Well, and how did you get on, my child?" inquired the squire.

"Not a word, sir, until I get into the dining-room, and then you shall hear it all," was the fair tyrant's reply.

"Why, by Jove! I do verily believe you've got over that old curmudgeon, you artful little minx, you!" exclaimed her uncle in great glee, hurrying her into the house as quickly as possible, all agog to hear her news.

Through some back passages they went, and then, opening a green baize door, found themselves in the entrance hall.

"Come, now," said the squire, as they entered the dining-room, where Mrs. Mainwaring was waiting for them; "I won't wait a moment longer; so tell your aunt and me all about the result of your ride this instant, miss, or I'll retract my promise of the diamond bracelet I made this morning."

"Listen, then, ladies and gentlemen—or, rather, I should say aunt and uncle," said the fair Gladys, standing in the center of the hearthrug and raising her whip to insure silence.

"What should you say if, paying a visit to the Lea farm to-morrow morning, you were to find that every vestige of barbed wire had disappeared from its fences? Would you allow that the persuasive powers of your devoted niece were somewhat of a higher order than usual?"

"By Jove, indeed I should!" burst forth her uncle. "But you don't mean to say it's a fact, Gladys, that you have actually got that old bear to do as you say, do you?"

"Indeed I do, uncle; and he's not a bear at all, allow me to say—only rather rough, that's all, poor man. Old John Wilder is as good a fellow as ever breathed, if you only humor him a little—as you must in future, uncle, if only for my sake."

"Well, wonders will never cease, that's very certain," said her uncle; "and how on earth you manage it," he continued, "I can't for the life of me imagine."

"I will tell you," said Miss Gladys. "Arrived at the ogre's castle, having carefully kept to the sides of the footpath all the way, partly from diplomacy, partly because I did not want either Brilliant or myself to be annoyed by barbed wire, I inquired of the maid servant who came to the door if Mr. Wilder was at home. He was round in the straw yard, she said, and she would go and fetch him, if I would wait a moment.

"I waited accordingly, and presently the ogre appeared. 'How do you do, Mr. Wilder?' I said. 'Your servant, miss,' answered he, his grim features relaxing a little, I fancied, as he looked me over. 'You don't recollect me, I see,' said I, 'but you and I are very old friends for all that, Mr. Wilder.' 'Old friends! Why, who be 'ee, then, in the name o' fortin'?' he replied, looking at me so hard, oh! so hard, uncle. 'Have you quite forgotten little Gladys Onslow, who you used to be so kind to when you lived at Hazeldean farm down in Warwickshire?' 'Forgotten? No!' he almost roared, 'and never shall, that's more! And you're her? Coom, off your horse this instant, my pretty, and into the house and have a talk wi' me over old times.' Oh, uncle the poor old man, do you know, was so pleased. When I got off my horse and when he held out his hand and I not only took it, but gave him a kiss into the bargain; he actually shed tears he did indeed. Well, I went in and had a glass of milk, and we had such a talk of old times as never was. And when we had finished I told him what I had come about. He listened attentively, and then he said, 'And so you want the stuff—the darned stuff, he called it, uncle—down, do ee, my dear?' I replied that it certainly would please me very much, and you and everybody else as well. 'Don't say another word,' he exclaimed, 'every bit of it shall be off my farm before nightfall. I only wish you had got something harder to ask me.'

"There, uncle," wound up Gladys, "that's how it was done, as the conjurers say. Now, tell me what you think of my talents as a diplomatist, and, above all, your opinion of my dear old friend John Wilder."

"My dear," replied the squire, kissing his niece, "I think you ought to be a prime minister at least, and as for your friend John Wilder; my opinion of him is altogether altered. We'll both of us ride over and see him again this very afternoon, and I'll thank him myself."

"And now," said her uncle, rubbing his hands, "which is it to be, Gladys, a new hunter or a diamond bracelet?"—Chicago Chronicle.

HOW COOLEY WORKED.

Former Chief Justice of Michigan Tells of His Famous Colleague.

Judge John W. McGrath, who retired from the Chief Justiceship of the Michigan Supreme Court at the close of 1895, was seen by a correspondent and asked as to his belief in the cause of the physical and mental breakdown of ex-Justice Thomas M. Cooley, who is now in a private retreat at Flint. He was also asked if, in his opinion, jurists were particularly prone to collapse of that description.

Judge McGrath is a big man. His figure of more than six feet is as erect as in his young manhood, but snowy white hair and beard tell the work of Father Time. He is strong and vigorous himself, and while laughingly declaring that his work had left him without a scar, said:

"Poor Cooley; he is a victim of his own tremendous energy, without the physical strength to bear up under it. As a matter of fact, I doubt if any man could have stood it. While his work on the bench had something to do with his final breakdown, for it always was and always will be most arduous work, his labors off the bench were alone more than most men care to undertake.

"His works on constitutional law, on torts, his many magazine articles and the preparation of 'Cooley's Blackstone' were all completed while he was engaged on work that would have completely filled most men's time.

"I believe he worked eighteen hours a day. I know that while on the bench he not only was the first one to arise in his own home so as to work before breakfast, but that his work table was placed in his sitting-room so that he could continue the grind evenings, and at the same time partially enjoy the company of his family and friends. He would turn sometimes to join in their conversation, only to bury himself a moment later in his writing.

"While I believe the life span of jurists is probably as long as is that of any other profession similarly deprived of exercise and fresh air, I do think that for many years there has not been an occupant of the Michigan bench who has retired without the work having left its mark. This is owing largely to the fact that they have strained every nerve to keep their docket clear.

"This example was set by that great four, Cooley, Christiancy, Campbell and Graves. Christiancy and Campbell are dead, and Cooley's mind has failed, but Graves is a hale and hearty old gentleman living in Detroit. In Ohio and many other States the business of the State bench is behind two, three or more years, while here every case is heard when ready, no matter how great the strain, and opinions are also rushed out on the same schedule.

"As to Judge Cooley, I never knew a man of such intense mental activity, and his breakdown came solely as the result of overwork. He was always a man of spotless reputation and most correct habits, and no other cause can possibly be assigned. His work on the Interstate Commerce Commission, his last sustained effort, was, in my opinion, simply the last wrench."

Not in It.

Mrs. Justup—"Goodness, no! She's pleasant enough and all that, but I understand that her husband only gets a hundred dollars a month!"—Cleveland Leader.

Culture's Enemy.—Culture and ignorance from time immemorial have been at war. The one elevates and emancipates, while the other degrades and enthralls.—Rev. G. C. Houghton, Episcopalian, Hoboken, N. J.

Woman's Way.—The best service possible to any woman, however richly dowered, is to do womanly things in a womanly way, thus illustrating in her life and character the loftiest type of womanhood.—Rev. Arthur Little, Baptist, Dorchester, Mass.

Marriage.—There are tricks in love as well as in trade. One of them is to make things seem to be what they are not. As you value your life, young woman, do not marry a manikin, a hatter's show block, a tailor's lay figure.—Rev. Madison C. Peters, Reformed, New York City.

Yellow Journalism.—A stamp of newspaper is being spread broadcast over the land which not only is a disgrace to the high vocation of the press, but is debasing the tastes, destroying the loftier aspirations and ruining the souls of thousands upon thousands.—Rev. VICTIM OF THE X RAY.

Young Woman Is Terribly Burned and Made Bald by Its Intense Power.

Miss Josie McDonald of New York has had a strange experience with the X rays, and her pitiable condition is evidence of their terrible power. Miss McDonald had some teeth drawn and a violent pain in the jaw followed which the dentist could not account for. He took her to a laboratory where a photograph of her jaw was taken by the rays, the sitting lasting ten minutes. This photograph was somewhat blurred and a second was taken, the exposure of her cheek to the rays lasting fifteen minutes. The effect was soon after evident in the unnatural redness of the cheek and bloodshot eyes, and the next day the pain was so intense as to make her hysterical. Her face, too, was almost black, and her hair began to fall out.

Her family physician, Dr. Griswold, who was called, says the extent of the blistering is most remarkable. It runs down the neck, through the linen of the high collar. The discoloration is still very marked, and the doctor cannot say whether the hair will grow again. All of it on one side of her head has completely fallen off.

The Liquor Problem.

"I wouldn't of swiped the ham," said the contrite prisoner, "but I was half drunk."

"Ah!" said the city missionary.

"That's what done it. If I had of been paralyzed, as I ought of been at that time o' night, I wouldn't of got into trouble."—Indianapolis Journal.

Getting Down to Business.

"Have you made any new discoveries to-day with reference to that case we're working on?" inquired one detective.

"Not yet," replied the other. I haven't had time to read the newspapers."—Washington Star.

Bacon—They had a fire down at Brickabrak's yesterday, and what do you suppose was the last thing they got out?"

Egbert—I don't know.

"Why, the fire, of course."—Yonkers Statesman.

LADIES WHO STOLE.

Strange Tales Are Told of Our Ancestors of Washington's Time.

We naturally have a very exalted opinion of the aristocracy of our country and can scarcely be convinced that the ladies of society in the early days of independence conducted themselves in any but the most dignified manner. Indeed some of their descendants would feel highly elated to know that they in any wise resemble their supposed courtly ancestors. It is to be hoped that they are not kin to the personages referred to in the following complaint:

One of our early statesmen actually complains that "between tippee beaux and fashionable belles an honest fellow will stand a good chance of being fleeced by the politest tissue of mistakes conceivable. The gentleman will help himself very casually to your hat if it is better than his, take up your umbrella with the most absent air imaginable, bear off your loose coat without once perceiving his mistake and pick up your gloves, 'they so much resemble his.'"

And now for the ladies' part in this proceeding:

"The lady will borrow your penknife, very accidentally put your pocket handkerchief into her muff or playfully take your ring from your finger or breastpin from your bosom, all as innocently as though it was the very thing you called upon her for, so that between ladies and gentlemen you will stand a good chance of being turned out, stripped of all your possessions, according to the newest rules of etiquette."—Philadelphia Press.

Kipling's Famous Poem.

It is the sentiment, says Arlo Bates in The Atlantic, and not the object, which arouses sympathy and kindles the imagination. No mistake could be more complete than to suppose that in this poem is to be found any argument in favor of the use of machinery as material for poetry. In "McAndrew's Hymn" it is the character of the stanch old engineer and his feelings by which the reader is moved. The wonders of the great engine are a hindrance, and not a help, if they are looked at in any way other than through the eyes of McAndrew. The piece succeeds or fails to the degree in which it makes his emotion real and contagious to the reader, and that, too, as emotion pure and simple, quite without regard to what has excited it. In so far as the attention is caught by tailrod, crank throws, feeding pump and "purrin dynamos"—finely suggestive as is the epithet in this last—the emotional effect is weakened at the expense of the intellectual.

Hot Milk as Nutriment.

If any one doubts the nourishing properties of milk, let a test be made of the following preparation of it: When very weary or weak from exhaustion, heat some milk to the scalding point, until a thin skin begins to wrinkle upon the surface, and then drink it as hot as possible. It refreshes almost instantly and restores the exhausted vitality to a surprising extent as soon as it is taken. It is more nutritious than any of the beef teas made from meat extracts or that made from fresh beef.

NERVOUS PROSTRATION.

"Will you kindly allow me," writes MISS MARY E. SAIDT, of Jobstown, N. J., to Mrs. Pinkham, "the pleasure of expressing my gratitude for the wonderful relief I have experienced by taking your Compound? I suffered for a long time with nervous prostration and general debility, caused by falling of the womb. It seemed as though my back would never stop aching. I could not sleep. I had dull headaches. I was weary all the time, and life was a burden to me. I sought the seashore for relief, but all in vain. On my return I resolved to give your medicine a trial. I took two bottles and was cured. I can cheerfully state, if more ladies would only give your medicine a fair trial they would bless the day they saw the advertisement, and there would be happier homes. I mean to do all I can for you in the future. I have you alone to thank for my recovery, for which I am very grateful."

FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

A COLUMN OF PARTICULAR INTEREST TO THEM.

Something that Will Interest the Juvenile Members of Every Household—Quaint Actions and Bright Sayings of Many Cute and Cunning Children.

Ditty from Juvenile Town.

There was once a dear baby from Juvenile Town
Jumped out of a cabbage leaf
His ears were like shells, and his hair was brown,
The former of pink, the latter of down;
But when he arrived he had nary a gown—
This imp from a cabbage leaf.

Now I'm sorry to say that in Juvenile Land
The babies wear only skin;
But when they arrive on our shores of sand
They must look about for a dress or a band
That will hide them all over the head and the hand—
These imps with nothing but skin.

And this is why Baby just hid in a petal
(He told me the other day),
For cabbages oftener are safer than nettle,
Or dahlias, or squash leaves, or things of such mettle,
For babies to hide in till we folk can settle
On clothes that are built the right way.

When We Go Fishing.

When we go fishing in the brook,
Joey and Cicely and I,
A crooked pin's our only hook.
That catches 'em! Sometimes we tie
The string tight to a willow limb
Just where the biggest minnows swim.

Then we lie down there in the shade,
And watch our bobs that tip and float;
And once a bridge of rocks we made,
And built a castle and a moat;
But, just as sure as we begin,
Why, Joey goes and tumbles in.

Then all the frightened fish they hide
Beneath the rocks and in the pool.
There's not a minnow to be spied!
The water settles clear and cool
With bubbles 'tween the rocks, and foam;
But then we must take Joey home.

Of course he cries at mamma's look.
She says: "Is this the only fish
That you can catch in Silver Brook?"
She knows, though, we'd get all she'd wish,
With just our string and pail and pin—
If Joey wouldn't tumble in!
—St. Nicholas.

How Five Kittens Came to be Named.

There was the mother cat and five kittens, and none of the kittens had names. Somehow the children had been so busy watching them tumble over each other and try to walk and then all go to sleep in a bunch, that they had not thought of naming them.

The mother cat was gray and four of the kittens were gray, but the fifth cat was black, jet black, and so without any planning or forethought the fifth kitten came to be called Blackie.

It was easy enough to distinguish her from the others, but how to tell apart the four gray ones was a question. At last it was discovered that three of the gray ones had white feet and the fourth one was gray all over. So again, without a thought of naming her, the children designated her as Gray Paws.

And then there were the other three. One of these had but one eye, the children announced sorrowfully, after the kittens were old enough to prove that they had eyes at all, and then in all tenderness and with no thought of reproach, the afflicted kitten became One Eye.

Still there were two left; two that looked almost exactly alike. Of course the children watched them every day and it did not take them long to find out that one of these was a very spunky kitten. She would spit at the others if they came near when she was eating, or if she was suddenly surprised by any one, and when this was discovered she was dubbed the Spitfire of the family.

But the remaining kitten was the one who made the others "stand 'round." If they did not do as she saw fit she boxed their ears. If the rest came around her saucer of milk she cuffed them away, and so of course she was the Boss.

And no one was more surprised than the children when we discovered that the kittens were all named, for every one was sure he had not named them.

And such a funny lot of names as it was: Blackie, Gray Paws, One Eye, Spitfire and Boss. But the names all fitted and some of them had been earned, and the kittens didn't seem to mind them in the least.—Youth's Companion.

Enlisting School Children.

Miss Eaton, of Pittsburg, is visiting the various public schools organizing Bands of Mercy among the pupils. The work is along the line of humane society efforts, though adapted to the minds of children, who are organized into societies with officers chosen from among themselves. Each member takes the following pledge:

"I will try to be kind to all living creatures and to protect them from cruel usage."

The plan is to hold appropriate exercises at stated periods, the literature for which is provided free of cost by Mr. Geo. T. Angell, a wealthy Boston gentleman, who is devoting a fortune to the work.

The children are said to be enthusiastic over the work, and it will undoubtedly prove successful. The movement already embraces bands aggregating over 1,000,000 members in various parts of the country.—Altoona (Pa.) Gazette.

Animals that Do Not Grow Thirst

How long would you be contented without a drop of water to drink? There are many different kinds of animals in the world that never in all their lives sip so much as a drop of water. Among these are the llamas of Patagonia and the gazelles of the far east. A parrot lived for fifty-two years in the "Zoo" at London, England, without drinking a drop of water, and many naturalists believe the only moisture imbibed by wild rabbits is derived from green herbage, laden with dew. Many reptiles—serpents, lizards and certain batrachians—live and thrive in places entirely devoid of water, and sloths are also said never to drink. An arid district in France has produced a race of non-drinking cows and sheep, and from the milk of the former Roquefort cheese is made. There is a species of mouse which has established itself on the waterless plains of western America, and which flourishes, notwithstanding the absence of moisture.

Labor Laws in Russia.

While Emperor Nicholas has declined until now to endow his people with a constitutional form of government, yet it cannot be denied that he is introducing many reforms which show that he is possessed of an enlightened and broad-minded sense of his responsibilities. Thus he has just promulgated a ukase prohibiting, under severe penalties, any form of labor on Sunday, or on the fourteen principal Russian feast days of the Muscovite calendar. This practically assures the laboring population sixty-six legal days of rest in the year. Children are not permitted under any circumstances to work more than eight hours a day, while eleven are henceforth to constitute the maximum working day of grown men. On Saturday the working day is limited to ten hours.

Buried with His Money on Him.

Not long ago a miserly person, who had been teased almost to death by his heirs, endeavored to cheat them out of his money. Before he died he left positive instructions that he should be buried in a certain suit of clothes. His wish was carried out, but after the funeral his surviving relatives could find no will and no money. Finally one of them suspected that the old man had served them a shabby trick, and suggested that the body be exhumed and the clothing examined. This was done, and the coat, waistcoat and trousers were found to be lined with Bank of England notes.—Chicago Record.

Danger in the X Ray.

Fine complexions, according to a recent sensational announcement, can be made by an application of the X ray. Prof. Elihu Thomson, the electrician, says this is not true, and that to prevent serious physical injury the ray must be used at some distance from the body, with an exposure of not more than from 15 to 30 minutes. Not long ago he tested the power of the ray on his little finger, held close to the tube for 12 minutes. Redness and irritation quickly followed, the nail fell off later, and the flesh looked like it had been scalded. The scar still remains, at the end of eight weeks. Enough is known of the ray to warrant the rule that it shall be handled only by the expert.

A Protection Against Lightning.

"People living in cities are prone to believe that the increasing number of telephone, telegraph and trolley wires increase the danger from electric storms," writes Edward W. Bok in the Ladies' Home Journal. "On the contrary, the maze of wires is a protection, and lessens the danger, since it is shown that where the wires attract the electricity they hold it, and discharge it only at the end of the wires in the central station. The fact is that of the two hundred lightning accidents every year only an average of forty occur in the cities. The trees in the country are a far greater danger; they account for the proportion of four cases in the country to one in the city."

Preserving His Boots.

A new wrinkle may be learned from an English soldier who was noted for keeping his boots in better condition and making them last longer than any of his brother officers. When asked what he did to them to prevent the leather from cracking and keeping it soft and smooth his reply was "Mutton bone." When an explanation was demanded he said: "It is nothing, I assure you. My man asks the cook for a knuckle bone, which he cleans and then bakes. After rubbing the leather with cream, he then frotes them as hard as he can with the bone. Usually my boots last me three years.—New Orleans Picayune.

The Fighting Bells.

One of the family of the "fighting Bells" of Augusta County, Va., has died at the homestead at Long Glade at the age of 80. He was Alexander R. Bell, one of five brothers who together had nineteen sons that fought in Capt. Cushing's company of the Fifth Virginia Regiment, Stonewall Brigade, and were nearly all killed in battle or died of wounds.

A man or woman who reads poetry will finally attempt to write it.

THE GOSPEL OF GRACE

EXPOUNDED BY OUR RELIGIOUS EDITOR.

Words of Wisdom, and Thoughts Worth Pondering Upon Spiritual and Moral Subjects—Gathered from the Religious and Secular Press.

This Is a Vale of Tears.

REV. R. L. BACHman, D. D., a prominent Presbyterian divine of Knoxville, Tenn., in a recent sermon said: "Observation and experience constantly impress upon us the fact that trials, sorrows and sufferings are man's earthly inheritance. Frequent efforts have been made by certain philosophers to veneer human life with joy, peace and pleasure. But little success has attended their efforts. Man's actual experience has shown such veneer to be exceedingly thin. In spite of all that has been said and written to the contrary, the fact remains that it is a life of burden bearing, of struggle, of disappointment, of fathomless regret. Even to the most favored and fortunate it is unsatisfactory. The life which they live is often envied by others, while it is despised by themselves. No life and no conditions of life are exempt from trouble. At his best estate, man knows nothing of absolute contentment, knows nothing of unalloyed joy. As sorrow is the universal inheritance, God's chosen people must be partakers of it. By reason of their nature and their environments, they are compelled to eat the bread of sorrow and drink the cup of tears. To best endure afflictions is to so conduct ourselves as to enjoy the bliss of the future state. Contemplation of heaven best enables the Christian to bear the burdens of earth. Anticipation of future joy makes him more reconciled to present sorrow. This anticipation is the reliance of every Christian and the only solace we have in this desolate pilgrimage here below."

Self-Dependence.

Learn to be self-dependent, young man, that so you may be in future years the better citizen. The sooner you are aware of the fact that this world is for you, only so far as your own energies can claim from it a part, the better for you and the world. It is not years that bring manhood, but it is manliness. It is the determination of the young man to do his own full part in life that makes its days worth the living. The mountain never comes to us. We must reach it here only by slow degrees, and its summit, to the heart of true ambition, has never yet been reached. There is always a step ahead to take, always a load to lift, always a wrong to right, upon the long road of life. Too many of God's creatures live through life and leave behind an aimless flight of years for the simple fact, they began without ambition. Not having the strength of character that comes by the practice of self-dependence, they lived and died children in the land. In this land, too, where all is toil and exertion to him who in any calling would succeed. In it, a few are tall, some reach to the high ones' shoulders, but the most, the majority, are undersized or dwarfs, simply because they had not instilled into their being in early life a spirit of self-dependence.—Weekly Bouquet.

What Christ Can Make You.

If you are to be anything in the world Christ must make you. You can succeed only by His permission and help. Have you let Him into your life to work and to build up and to transform? You are neighborly with Him; but that will not do. He must be allowed to become something more than your neighbor. He must be admitted into your heart. He must be allowed to abide at the very focus of your being and in the very springs of your life. Mere neighborliness would never have made Paul or John. It took personal, enthusiastic faith and love and surrender to make them. That you may reach the goal of life, that you may realize your best possible self, that you may be what Christ can make you, I call upon you to make an absolute surrender of your soul and body and spirit to Christ. Open your whole life to His incoming.—David Gregg, D. D.

The Voice and Silence of God.

The voice of God is calling men always, everywhere, and, I believe, with all my heart, that this is the only true way to interpret that message of the sea. This is what the Psalmist meant when he said: "Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." In just this way, through all the ages of human history, has all knowledge, all revelation been coming to men—the artist's inspirations, the poet's songs, the prophet's visions, the composer's melodies, all that man has ever learned of God, all that he can ever hope to know. The silences of God have been speaking to the silences of man, and human knowledge has been growing from more to more. And so it must ever be in God's great school of life, and the soul that listens best will learn the most.—Rev. J. S. Cutler.

A Common Sin.

Wastefulness is a sin. To spend foolishly or needlessly has no Bible sanction. God gives abundance, but He requires its right use and proper preservation. He commits His good things to us in trust. He regards what we have as loaned, not owned. He calls us His stewards, not proprietors. He holds us responsible for our possessions and acquisitions. He who squandres his revenues commits a gross offense and has a terrible account to render. Large substances wasted are a terrible thing for which to answer at heaven's bar. Riches are not intended to minister to extravagance, or to be hereafter, but are a gift to be divinely lavished on self, without regard to employed and accounted for.

Lead Me, O Lord.

I do not ask, O Lord, that life may be
A pleasant road;
I do not ask that Thou would'st take from me
Aught of its load.

I do not ask that flowers should always spring
Beneath my feet;
I know too well the poison and the sting
Of things too sweet.

For one thing only, Lord, I plead—
Lead me aright,
Though strength should falter and though heart should bleed,
Through peace to light.

I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see;
Better in darkness just to feel Thy hand,
And follow Thee.

Joy is like restless day, but peace divine,
Like quiet night;
Lead me, O Lord, till perfect day shall shine
Through peace to light.
—Adelaide Proctor.

The World's Best Interests.

The trained ear can detect sounds inaudible to the untrained; the trained eye can see into beauties invisible to ordinary mortals; the trained hand accomplishes things impossible to gross manipulation. The heart trained to interests outside itself looks upon a new world. Without interest in others, a narrow life remains narrow; with it even a sick room may become the center of world-wide influence. The shepherd tending his wandering sheep, the miner working amid dangers, the farmer wrestling with difficulties, the wife at her unpaid labors—all can live transformed lives if they feel their share in the world's best interests.

Steadfast.

It is always well for any one to be steadfast in anything and everything that is right, and especially should the Christian be steadfast in his religion. He ought to stand firm in his faith. The believer who is wavering and uncertain in his faith is weak in his religion and exerts very little influence for good. Indeed it is a question whether he does not do the cause of Christianity more injury than good. It is the person who stands fast and firm in the faith that derives the full benefits of his religion and is in turn helpful to Christianity.

The Lessons of Obedience.

The hardest lesson of all is that of obedience. Obedience is an unsavory word to the great majority. If we want to save our souls, if we want to be good citizens, we must practice obedience. Everyone in authority over us spiritually or temporarily demands our obedience. This obedience is not rendered to individuals in their personal capacity, but to God through them. No man owes allegiance to any other, save in so far as that other is God's delegate.

Loving Others.

To love others is the true counterpoise of our unsteady natures. Towering and infirm self-love is likely to collapse at any moment. The outflow of the heart upon others is in the ordering of God, the most infallible way of securing sanity of mind, so far as right human relations can secure it.

Shortness of Life.

The shortness of life is bound up with its fullness. It is to him who is most active, always thinking, feeling, working, caring for the people and for things, that life seems short. Strip a life empty and it will seem long enough.—Phillips Brooks

Notes and Comments.

The Jesuit missions in Alaska are in luck, as they are in the very heart of the gold region. The land consists of about three acres, which was purchased a few years ago for a church, school and graveyard. It is in the richest part of the Klondike region.

Rev. Dr. Henry Anstice is talked about to succeed the late Rev. Dr. William S. Langford as general secretary of the Protestant Episcopal Board of Missions. Dr. Anstice was for many years rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, but recently became rector of the Church of St. Matthias, Philadelphia.

The Sisters of Notre Dame recently celebrated the golden jubilee of their arrival in America in New York. The order was instituted in Paris and Mother Theresa and four other French sisters came here and settled in St. Mary's, Pa. Now they are established in the leading cities. In the world there are 2,000 sisters, teaching 70,000 pupils.

The 44th annual report of the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of New York, just issued, gives an interesting account of the work done by the association during the past year. The present membership is 7,300, the largest in its history, and the average attendance at the 15 branches was 5,202 daily. The number of students in the physical and educational classes shows a marked growth, 2,323 young men having attended the classes during the year.

Emperor William has begun at Berlin the practice of keeping the Lutheran churches of the metropolis open throughout the day on week days. Until now only the Catholic churches have been left thus open to stray worshipers on week days, and the extension of the custom to the Protestant edifices of an analogous character is giving widespread satisfaction, affording as it does to the people opportunities for quiet meditation and private worship.

MARCHESI METHODS.

HOW THE GREAT TEACHER TERRORIZES HER SCHOLARS.

Instructions In Singing From Her Not Altogether an Agreeable Ordeal—But She Conscientiously Labors Always For Her Pupil's Benefit.

In the musical world of Europe no teacher stands higher than Mme. Marchesi, and yet a first interview with her is an ordeal to be dreaded. She may tell you with almost brutal frankness that your cherished vocal projects are thin as air bubbles and that you had better turn your attention to cooking. Or, with one unusual gleam of her gray eyes and one sudden indrawn breath, making her thin lips still thinner, she may tell you that you are destined to lift the heart of the world in immortal song and wear the laurels of a great lyric career. Again, she may tell you with the same blunt severity that you have no looks at all for the stage, and after you have been accepted as a pupil you are still subjected to her merciless severity.

To be taught by Mme. Marchesi is not to have the luxury of an individual lesson, an hour's good, cozy, comfortable time all to yourself. By no means. That is not her plan. You are taught in class. You are thus introduced at once to an audience. You thus have an opportunity of conquering stage fright. You are thus submitted to the criticism of others. Not only your voice, but your manners, your gait, your way of holding your hands are studied. From head to foot you are scrutinized.

A small platform is in the center of Marchesi's salon, where the pupil stands and recites (or sings) her lesson. The class sit around the room and criticise. The pupil has to face not only the class, but the audience includes often the first musicians of the world. How does a sensitive woman bear the gun fire of Mme. Marchesi's criticism, her ridicule, her sarcasm and severity? One day one of the class was having her 15 minutes of lesson before a crowded room. Marchesi was in a sardonic humor that morning. Her remarks were brilliant, but more cutting than a Damascus blade. The audience felt that a climax was coming. It came. The girl's lip began to tremble as Marchesi's commentary sparkled and cut and sparkled again. Her lip trembled more and more. The agitation gained upon her whole body, till she shook like a willow in the wind. Poor dear, the other pupils held their breath. The room was silent as a tomb. You could hear Marchesi's watch tick in her pocket. Still the pupil strove to bring out the tone that those severe lips of Marchesi had commanded. At last the voice rolled out. The tone gained upon the room. The voice stopped.

"You sing like a fool!" literally hissed Marchesi, and the storm broke.

The girl burst into tears. Her sobs, coming upon the silence, were most painful. Not one of the pupils dared to rush forward with comfort or handkerchief. The girl threw the sheet of music on the floor and covered her face with her hands. Then, dashing the tears away from her face, she stooped down, gathered up the scattered music, tore it into shreds, tossed it to every part of the room, and rushed from the platform stage. All felt it was over with her forever, so far as lessons with Marchesi were concerned, and more than one heart ached for her.

"Ha, ha!" laughed Marchesi, rising delightedly from the piano, rubbing her hands together and walking, or rather stalking, majestically through the room and up and down and again seating herself at the piano. "Ha, ha! That girl will sing! She has the grand fire. She is dramatic. She has the fine passion of the devil." And the girl came back the next day and won Marchesi's bravos and hand clapping.

Upon another occasion Marchesi sat in judgment upon a pupil's hands as she stood upon the platform.

"Now, don't put up your lip like a baby," she says, "if I tell you that I never saw such a booby. You're as awkward as a country clown. Look at your hands! Just look at them dangling down at your sides like a jumping jack waiting to twitch on a pole. Mais, voila," she continued, softening a little, "if I do not tell you, ma chere, of these things now while you are in my salon, do you know who will tell you of them later on when you stand for the first time before one of the great audiences of Europe? The reporters will flay you alive and deservedly. Will they not note down every awkward gesture, every gaucherie? Will they not say, 'She has a divine voice, but she held her hands like a clown?' And when you read it in all the papers the next morning, ah, how you will exclaim, 'Why did not Marchesi correct me, tell me, reprove me, no matter how severely?' Now, hold your hands easily, one palm crossed upon the other, the right hand across the left, the forefinger and middle finger of the right hand between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand. Bon! Now, see what ease of position, what repose it gives to your whole figure as you stand there."

To look over the programme for the concerts Mme. Marchesi gives from time to time is to read a strange collection of names. Here are pupils from Japan. Here is a name from Norway. Here is a lady from Finland. Here are sturdy Scotch names. Here are American names—girls from St. Louis, San Francisco, the Maine woods, the gulf states. New Zealand has representatives on the programme. To look over Marchesi's album is to see some of the portraits of the world's great singers and their signatures.—New York Sun.

DESCENDANTS OF PILGRIMS.

Sir Walter Besant Figures That There Are 10,000 In America.

Many people in America claim descent from the pilgrim fathers. There might be a very considerable number, if we come to think of it. For instance, let us assume the number of married people among the first hundred who survived the first winter as 20 couples. We will allow them three children apiece. We will give to each of these children two—a large allowance, it is true. Then we have for each married couple, for the first generation, 3 descendants; for the second, 6; for the third, 12; for the fourth, 24; for the fifth, 48; for the sixth, 96; for the seventh, 192; for the eighth, 384; for the ninth and the present generation, 768, and for the original 20 married couples, 15,360. So that the living descendants of the Mayflower pilgrims can hardly be more than about 15,000. Out of these a great many have probably clean forgotten their descent. Probably there are not anything like 10,000.

If I were an American, I should certainly like to be one of that 10,000. Not that I feel the least attraction to a narrow and fanatic religion, but because the pilgrim fathers made so fierce a fight for existence and a place where they could think as they pleased and allow no one else to think as he might please. Ancestry, in this country at least, is chiefly a matter of selection. The people who keep up their genealogies drop out as they go along numberless branches. People who wish to recover their genealogies have got to "hitch on" at one of the dropped branches. Every marriage in a genealogy is a kind of junction, where many lines may meet. Now, the business of the genealogist is to look up all the junctions, to follow up each one and to choose the line which offers the most desirable alliances. Some years ago an ingenious gentleman offered to find royal descent for any one for £70 down. He did it, too, quite honestly. He said that if you could only get back 100 years or so it was perfectly easy to connect with Edward I or Edward III.—Sir Walter Besant in London Queen.

"My Own Notes"

I have made in a number of years of ardent collection quite a library of my own notes, and the fact that I have already lived two-thirds of my probable tether of life and am a "buccaneer" of the newspaper world by stress of circumstances sometimes gives me a pang. I recognize the ludicrousness of my collection for an impossible future of comfort and leisure, for even one possible posthumous work. I have never had leisure to produce one whole or complete piece of literature and probably never shall have a day's leisure in my life, but this irony of fate does not deter me.

I am like a collector of specimens of butterflies. He will never learn to fly, or the secret of it, or anything in particular, but he goes on collecting.

I shall never write the books of the sketch skeletons in my imagination, but I shall certainly continue to make endless preparations for a posthumous library of, according to my schemes and plots and themes, some 1,000 sturdy volumes.

The world of readers may thank God perhaps that these books will not appear in print, but I am just mad enough to get some zest in life out of making, in imagination, these schemes for books that can never be written. Perhaps it is as sane an occupation as old china collecting, stamp collecting, button collecting and, to jump to the extreme of Philistinism, the collection of dubious old masters, mostly daubs. I confess this speculation seems to me to be a fad no wiser. Looking at it from my point of view, as a book lover, I think what a library these daubs would buy.—Lotus.

Broke the Spell.

Up to the time of Cleveland's election it was a popular superstition with politicians that no candidate whose name began with the letter C could be elected to the presidency. The idea arose from the fact that no man whose surname presented this peculiarity, no matter how strong he was with the people, had ever been successful at the polls. There were two Clintons, George and DeWitt, William H. Crawford, Henry Clay, Lewis Cass and a number of others, who, though their prospects seemed bright indeed, met with a defeat when it came to the test. Several of the C's, George Clinton and Henry Clay, for instance, were strong candidates several times, but never could "make the riffle."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Sections of a Kentucky Pedigree.

Bob Jolly of Cave City has a handsaw purchased in 1796 in Virginia. It was bought in that year by the grandfather of the Otter brothers, the well known Louisville merchants, who are no spring chickens at this writing themselves. Mr. Otter, the grandfather, shortly after moved to Kentucky and brought the saw with him. Mr. Jolly has owned the saw for 43 years. The rear wheels of the wagon in which Mr. Otter made his trip to Kentucky from Virginia are still to be seen on the place of Mrs. Caleb Freeman in the Cave City country. These are about 100 years old.—Glasgow Times.

DESTROY A MILLION DOLLARS.

Women Experts Who Can Detect the Best Made Counterfeits.

"Every working day in the year Uncle Sam destroys a million dollars: deliberately tears up and grinds to pulp one million dollars' worth of paper money—genuine bank notes and greenbacks," writes Clifford Howard in the Ladies' Home Journal. "A million dollars in one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, one-hundred, and one-thousand-dollar notes are daily punched full of holes, cut into halves and thrown into a machine that rapidly reduces them to a mass of mushy substance.

"Whenever a piece of paper money becomes soiled or torn it may be presented to the United States Treasury and redeemed. Sooner or later every note that circulates among the people becomes unfit for further service, for it is bound to become dirty or mutilated by constant handling, and the United States government stands ready to give the holder of such a note a new note in exchange for it; or, in other words, the government will redeem it.

"The majority of the clerks employed in this important department of the government are women, many of whom are the most expert money counters and counterfeit detectors in the world. In fact, only experts can properly perform the work that is required; for not only must the soiled and mutilated money be accurately and rapidly counted, but all counterfeit notes must be detected and thrown out. When we consider that some counterfeiters can so cleverely imitate genuine money that their spurious notes will circulate through the country without detection, and are not discovered until they are finally turned into the treasury, some idea of the proficiency of these experts can be gained, especially when we bear in mind that these notes are often so worn that the imprint on them can scarcely be deciphered. It not infrequently happens that these bad notes are detected simply by the feel of them, which, in some cases, is really the only way of discovering the fraud; for while a counterfeiter may occasionally succeed in so perfectly imitating the design of a note to mislead even an expert, it is next to impossible for him to counterfeit the paper used by the government."

Posing Sitters Before a Camera.

"As to the actual work under a skylight, only a few general hints may be given, as here each must 'work out her own salvation,'" writes Frances Benjamin Johnston in an article, "What a Woman Can Do With a Camera," in the Ladies' Home Journal. "Do not attempt to pose people, or to strain your sitters into uncomfortable or awkward positions, in order to obtain picturesque effects. Watch them, and help them into poses that are natural and graceful. Study their individuality, striving to keep the likeness, and yet endeavoring to show them at their best. Avoid emphasizing the peculiarities of a face either by lighting or pose; look for curves rather than angles or straight lines, and try to make the interest in the picture center upon what is most effective in your sitter. The one rule of lighting is never to have more than a single source of light. Many portraits, otherwise good, are rendered very inartistic by being lighted from several different directions."

Roman Doors.

The ancient Romans were not allowed, except by special law, to open a door outward; but two brothers who had distinguished themselves in war with the Sabines were granted this privilege of opening their doors to the street, after the Athenian manner. It was attended, however, with this inconvenience—when any one passed out, he had to strike the door vigorously from within to warn any one approaching to keep his distance.

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29.....1897

The report is current that a plan is on foot to secure a division of Alaska, it being proposed to form a new Territory, to be known as Lincoln, and this will include the Yukon river basin, with its rich placers. According to the boundaries suggested, all that will be left in Alaska, if the division bill passes Congress, is a narrow strip on the sea coast running from a point below the mouth of the Yukon down to the present limits of the Territory. Those back of the movement are said to be in favor of Eli A. Gage as the first Governor of Lincoln Territory. State-building is all right, and as we are not there to give the matter personal attention we'll let it go at that.

Somebody who wants to explain what the editorial "we" signifies, says the meaning varies to suit the circumstances. For instance, when you read "we expect our wife home to-day," the "we" refers to the editor; when it is "we are a little late with our work," it includes the whole office, even the devil and the towell; "we are having a boom," the town is meant; "we received over 700,000 immigrants last year," and it embraces the nation; but "we have hog cholera in our midst" only refers to the man who takes the journal for two or three years without paying for it.

George C. Pardee and William R. Davis are both from Alameda county, and each is desirous of being the Republican candidate for Governor. Several meetings of themselves and their friends have been held to see which will withdraw in favor of the other, but neither relinquisheth. The Sacramento Bee, speaking from an independent standpoint, remarks that it may be that both are counting over the Dead Sea's fruit that will turn to ashes on the lips. And all that, too, without counting upon what the voters of California may do as between either one of them and a Democratic candidate.

Reports from the Yaqui country state that the Yaqui Indians resent the encroachment of white men in search of gold, and that the Indians are driving all the white men out of the oountry. The Yaquis have been doing that for many years, and since they have established peace with Mexican authorities doubtless the latter are in sympathy. It is an ideal country for the gold-hunter, according to evidence heard from those who have seen some of it.

The New Orleans Board of Health is paying out nearly $1,000 per day to special employees required in combatting the spread of yellow fever, and it is estimated that the city is losing one million dollars per week through trade diverted to other points. But the scourge has spread to other points, and it remains for Jack Frost to temporarily stop its ravishes, while a comprehensive system of sanitation in the future may stamp it out altegether.

Military experts are at present interested in a new self-moving car, which is to be a veritable carriage of death. It is to be driven by a 16-horse power engine the rate of over forty miles an hour over a country reasonably level. The climax and purpose of this remarkable machine is to carry two rapid-firing cannon. One man only is needed to run this terrible wheeled weapon of war, and this same man also attends to the firing and loading.

Leutgert, Chicago's infamous murderer, escaped conviction of wife-boiling by a disagreement of the jury. "The second trial will not be as long as the recent trial was," said the State's Attorney. "We know the defense now. We are also better prepared with our evidence, and much that was submitted during the trial just ended will be omitted in the new trial. We have considerable new evidence."

The Postoffice Department has determined on a general extension of the money order system. Assistant Postmaster General Heath believes that any postoffice wanting money order facilities should have them.

The Beggars of Italy.

"Bicycling Through the Dolomites," in The Century, is an account of Colonel George E. Waring's European trip. Concerning mendicancy in Italy, Colonel Waring writes: Perhaps there is no better index to the good or bad condition of the working people of a country than is afforded by the number of beggars one meets on the roads. The poles set up at the border of Austria, with their spiral stripes of yellow and black, do not mark the line between it and Italy much more clearly than does the advent of the beggar the moment the line is crossed. In Austrian Tyrol there are virtually no beggars. On the Italian side, even well dressed people in the fields will leave their work to beg coppers from the passing traveler.

One day, in the upper Innthal, a couple of bright looking, rosy faced children ran after us, asking for kreutzers. "Mawknix" upbraided them for such a shameful act, and they slunk away. He spoke of this with much indignation to a neighbor, who said their whole family were away in the fields at work, or they would not have dared to beg, and that he would see that they were well spanked when their mother came home at night. Nuns and a few favored cripples sometimes ask alms at the doors of the churches in the larger towns, and the poor box is always found inside, but the peasantry and the churches take care of their own poor, so that the vice of beggary is unknown among them.

In Italy, on the other hand, it is obvious that special conditions of deformity are artificially produced. Both legs broken and badly reset in childhood constitute a good source of income for life, and anything that appeals to sympathy is made the occasion for cultivating a very mistaken and mischievous charity.

She Never Kissed.

"I reckon if I was to ketch my daughter kissin of a man I'd just natchelly cut him into mince meat ground fine," said the old man from the swamps of the Bracken hills.

"Then your daughter won't kiss the boys?" ventured a Dover youth with spectacles.

"Well, I reckon not, young man," and the old man gave him a look that dazzled his specs.

"But—uh, you know, some girls—who are engaged—you know—sometimes kiss their—their—boys—you know—and—it's all right and proper—and"—

The old man looked at him real hard, and, after watching the youth wilt like a tobacco leaf in an August sun, thundered out, "Well, my daughter never kissed a livin man, not even her pap—ner a poodle dog, ner a cat, ner nothin."

"But there's no harm—and why—er—why—er?" stammered the brave youth.

"Well, I reckon the most principalist reson why my daughter never kissed nothin is that I never had any daughter."

And the thoughtful silence of the young man was so dense that you could hear the price of farm lands drop quietly, drop by drop, while the farm products hanging in the tobacco shed tier by tier.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Constantinople's Beauty.

No one ever neared Constantinople without being struck by its marvelous beauty. Mrs. Max Muller, in "Letters From Constantinople," thus describes it:

"Under all lights and at all hours the view of Constantinople from the Marmora is unique in loveliness. The gentle outlines of the low hills, the varied colors, the magnificent buildings form a whole, combining in one the beauties of Stockholm, Venice and the bay of Naples. When lit up by sunshine, the varieties of color are dazzling. The eye rests on mosque after mosque, with their snow white minarets, in sharp contrast to the almost black cypresses that mark the small, unused burial grounds surrounding each mosque or the vast cities of the dead at Scutari, beyond Pera, and outside the old city walls. The roofs of most Turkish houses are a rich brown, while large plane trees, with their bright green leaves, stand in every garden, and over all is a sky so blue that after a sojourn of several weeks one longs for the contrast of English clouds."

The Political Handkerchief.

There has just been sold by auction in France the complete set of an old newspaper which was probably unique. It was called the Mouchoir de Poche Politique (Political Pocket Handkerchief) and was published in 1831.

The proprietors hit upon the idea of printing it on cheap cotton stuff for the purpose of evading the high paper duty. The complete collection consisted of 144 numbers—just a gross of pocket handkerchiefs—for it is evident from the title that the publishers believed the newspaper would serve two purposes.

The price was 3 pence—3 shillings per dozen—not a high price to pay for news, articles, theatrical criticisms and a pocket handkerchief combined.

Unfortunately the cotton required too much ink, and the scheme had to be abandoned.—London Globe.

Larding Pork.

In larding with pork the fattest piece procurable should be bought (lean salt pork is not available for any use) and the strips always cut from that part between the streak of lean and the rind. This is the only portion firm enough for the purpose. The bits should then be laid in ice water to become crisp before using.—New York Post.

Canadian Jewelry.

It is something of a disgrace to Canada that her manufacturers of cheap plated jewelry are in the habit of stamping it genuine gold. The excuse given is that foreigners flood our markets with such fraudulent jewelry, and to hold their own Canadian manufacturers must commit the same fraud.—Montreal Witness.

In Denmark and in Norway the posts of shorthand writers at the respective parliaments of those countries are chiefly occupied by women, it having been found that women as a rule succeed far better than men in this form of reporting.

It is the suggestion of a housekeeper that to take down the brass curtain poles at the spring housecleaning, as well as the curtains, and wrap them in tissue paper until the autumn is well worth the trouble.

He is now the sole owner of what was the Kirman & Rickey partnership property in Nevada and California, paying about $250,000 for his deceased partner's interest.

The Government is now receiving bids for carrying the mail on the different routes. We expect that bidders will, as usual, offer to work for Uncle Sam for about nothing. We cannot understand why people will carry the mail for next to nothing. If Eastern bidders take the contracts for ridiculously low figures the local people should make them pay a fair compensation under a sub-contract.

The case of the People vs. Lee Wah was given to the jury at 8 o'clock Tuesday evening. The jury remained out till 10 o'clock Wednesday morning, when Foreman Lake stated to the Court that it was impossible for the jury to agree on a verdict, and thereupon the Court discharged the jury. The charge was "an assault with intent to commit murder," and we are informed that some were in favor of bringing in a verdict of guilty as charged and some favored a verdict of a lesser offense. In all probability the defendant will have another trial.

A few weeks ago the editor was taken with a very severe cold that caused him to be in a most miserable condition. It was undoubtedly a bad case of la grippe and recognizing it as dangerous he took immediate steps to bring about a speedy cure. From the advertisement of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and the many good recommendations included therein, we concluded to make a first trial of the medicine. To say that it was satisfactory in its results, is putting it very mildly, indeed. It acted like magic and the result was a speedy and permanent cure. We have no hesitancy in recommending this excellent Cough Remedy to anyone afflicted with a cough or cold in any form.—The Banner of Liberty, Libertytown, Maryland. NEWSY NOTES FROM BIG PINE.

BIG PINE, Oct. 29, 1897.

EDITOR INDEPENDENT—The hamlet of "Bigpine" hits the glowing tints of the approaching winter with a crop of new dwellings, indicating a healthy growth. Prof. Dixon, of the academic department of the school, has erected a stately edifice southwest of the knowledge shop, a portion of which is used for the district. This addition to the McConnel suburb nicely punctuates the prediction of a certain modest scribe as to the future muchness of the hamlet. Dr. Middleton has transformed the Wm. McDonald residence on the Uhlmeyer tract into a neat and comfortable dwelling. Mr. Pratt—an energetic miner and prospector, and an early Inyo pioneer—now occupies a neat house erected on the Naylor ranch, just west of the Eugley place. Mr. Chas. Salier, from the ravishing clime of the once fairest domain of the Eternal City, has built himself a reminder of his early Italian home opposite the Campbell ranch, and permanently severed his connection with Europe. Dan Hall, the expert engineer of a Saline Valley borax ship, is putting up a fine cottage near the school house, on the Naylor ranch

S. H. Spratt has lately concluded a successful run of the Baker creek saw mill.

The good people of the hamlet will probably "thank" for the bountiful output of the earth on the sacred Thursday of next month. The young braves of the tribe have secured one of the noblest baseball outfits ever shipped to Inyo, and will give a three days' tournament of the national game—no organization of Inyo barred. In addition to this attraction, foot-racing, rapid horse-travel, turkey-shoots and "sich" will be done after the old-time hamlet methods. Should wind and weather permit, visitors can visit the now popular resort of "Klondyke lake" and witness the sailing of the McRey, a yacht constructed by Ruckford & Callow, and the pulling of Uhlmeyer's yawl over the billows of this wonderful sea. Should the time he propitious, look out for catfish galore. The "Ladies' Aid" will do itself proud a little later on with a Fair, the object of which is to get funds to complete the insideness of their neat little church.

Hoping these few lines, etc.

SWAMPER.

Panamint Notes.

Billy Langdon and Julius Goldsmith came in Tuesday from the Panamint country and report considerable work going on there.

Pheby & Son are milling 100 tons of rock at the little three-stamp mill at Postoffice springs from the mines they have bonded in Tuba canyon, but nothing can yet be said as to the value of the ore.

Peter Donahue has just taken out about 300 sacks of fine rock that will probably mill from $40 to $45 per ton, and this will be run as soon as the mill has finished for Pheby & Son.

Montgomery Brothers are working seventeen men, taking out ore and developing.

A nice piece of gold was taken out of the Cooper mine about two weeks ago. It came from the hanging wall of a very narrow stringer, was about thirteen inches long, almost round in shape, and contained very little quartz. There was about $300 in the piece and if it had been found in Trinity county there would probably have been a big blow about it.

King & Son struck a good rich stringer in Pleasant canyon a few days ago, but nothing is yet known of its extent.

Stotler, the storekeeper, has some rich ore out ready for the mill which will be crushed as soon as the mill can be had. —Randsburg Miner.

Jim Miller will start about 900 head of cattle from here for Amadee, beef in one and stock cattle in another drove. Since arriving here about ten days ago he has bought over 700 head of cattle. He has been buying for the Eastern market altogether this fall in connection with Thos. Keogh, and in Lassen, Plumas, Sierra and Modoc counties they have left about $280,000, and in this State and Nevada Mr. Keogh has spent over half a million dollars this season. The majority of the cattle bought in this county averaged about 5 cents for steers and 4½ cents for cows weighed and delivered at Amadee. These large inroads upon the ranges of this section by Eastern buyers is quite a blow to San Francisco buyers, who have laid back and let Eastern men take cattle out from under their noses. It seems to be the general impression, and we guess it is right, that San Francisco will have to pay a good price for all the beef she gets this winter.—Alturas New Era.

In Arizona recently a man was sentenced to pay a fine of ten dollars or go to jail for ten days. He had only three dollars, and the court accepted that sum in lieu of three days imprisonment. By some carelessness on the part of the jailer, however, the man was kept in jail for the full ten days. Naturally he made objection and demanded redress, to which demand the court replied that it was no doubt just, but there seemed to be only one way in which could be granted. If he would commit a second offense he should be sentenced for ten days as before, and then be allowed three days' discount or rebate.

Another duel has been fought in Europe, and, contrary to the usual results, it has been attended by the death of one of the principals. There is probably no significance to be attached to the fact that the dead man was a journalist.

BOTTLED BACTERIA.

Fears Hitherto Expressed as to Their Dire Effects Are Passing Away.

The average layman has long been sustained by a secret belief that the vast majority of bacteria are harmless, and, considering that he daily consumes millions of them in eating, drinking and sleeping, it is consoling to find the belief confirmed by an eminent authority.

Another scientist contributing to an English review does something toward relieving bacteria of their evil name by explaining how much they have to do with successful butter making. Butter, as every one knows, is best made from sour cream and does not keep well unless the cream is soured before churning. This result is usually attained by letting the cream stand till it sours of its own accord. But a series of experiments carried on in Sleswick-Holstein have proved that the souring of cream is produced by the presence of certain bacteria, which can be cultivated and introduced in such a way as to cause artificially the necessary souring.

A doctor named Witter has studied the subject, and "so skillfully blended certain cultures together that when the mixture was added in due proportion to sterilized cream to effect souring, the butter made therefrom was of most delicious flavor, pure and of great commercial value, inasmuch as it kept admirably.

The dried seed or powder of the bacteria used in this process can now be bought put up in bottles. A proportion is added to a small quantity of skimmed milk, which is subjected to a moderate continuous heat till the bacteria have developed. The "fermentation starter" is then added to the cream. The pure culture is only used occasionally, enough of the "starter" being left over every day to begin operations with on the next. The excellence of Danish butter is attributed to the care taken in choosing the "fermentation starter."—Popular Science Monthly.

HUMMING BIRDS.

Their Wonderfully Fashioned Diminutive Nests and Their Tiny Eggs.

Suddenly a glint shot from the point where my gaze was dreamily focused. That was all, but suspicion and savage instincts were aroused. For ten minutes my eyes followed the contour of each of the small boughs 20 feet above me, mere twigs from a higher and greater branch, which in turn declined from a mighty, outstretched arm of the giant. Presently suspicion centered in an insignificant, lichen covered wart on the upper side of a branch as large, perhaps, as a lady's wrist. It was like a dozen others, yet not exactly like them. The lichen seemed to me just a shade grayer and more regular, and the knot was a trifle too round. I feared to take my eyes away, lest it were lost before I had proved it to be only a natural excrescence. The sudden glint again struck my eye, there was a strange, tuneful hum, and—eureka! Directly above the point I was watching there hovered, with wings vibrating themselves into a misty point, an exquisite ruby throat. Then it settled on the diminutive cup of lichen, and I had found my first humming bird's nest.

By climbing far up above and then crawling carefully down on a separate limb, one could look over the nest, scarcely a yard away, to admire the tiny white eggs and the even more fairy-like nest, marvelously woven inside with the finest and softest fiber, and coated on the outer periphery against the weather with delicate lichen, which just turned the rim so as to shed any insistent raindrop that might penetrate the manifold roof of leaves overhead. The whole would have fitted in a circle made by joining the index finger and thumb.—"The Oakdwellers," by C. D. Lanier, in Scribner's.

Death Through a Tarantula.

One of the quickest and most complete and justifiable killings that ever I saw came about through a tarantula. It was at a mine camp, and the camp bully had a tarantula impaled on a stick. A man newly arrived from the east stood gazing, fascinated with horror, at the squirming reptile, working its black fangs in the effort to reach something that it could fasten them into. Suddenly, without warning, the bully thrust the tarantula straight into the tenderfoot's face. His whiskers saved him from the fangs, but he let out a yell as if he had actually been bitten and jumped back, I fully believe, ten feet. Then, as the fellow came poking the tarantula toward him again, the tenderfoot drew his revolver and turned loose on his tormentor. His first shot would have been enough, as it went straight through the fellow's body, but the tenderfoot had his excitement to work off, and he never stopped shooting until his revolver had been emptied and the man with the tarantula was a sieve. "Served him right," was the verdict of the coroner's jury, and the case never went to court for trial.—New York Sun.

Wesley Is There.

One of the most beautiful English church edifices is Barnet church, Herts. In this church, according to The Methodist Times of London, are groined niches in which respectively are appropriately placed well considered and cleverly modeled statuettes of England's six greatest preachers. The list is as follows: St. Augustin of Canterbury, the apostle of England; St. Aiden, bishop of Lindisfarne; St. Hugh of Lincoln; Latimer, the martyr; John Wesley and Canon Liddon. So far as we are aware, this is the first time John Wesley has been placed in an Episcopal church on a level with such goodly company.

THAT TERRIBLE SCOURGE.

Malarial disease is invariably supplemented by disturbance of the liver, the bowels, the stomach and the nerves. To the removal of both the cause and its effects Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is fully adequate. It "fills the bill" as no other remedy does, performing its work thoroughly. Its ingredients are pure and wholesome, and it admirably serves to build up a system broken by ill health and snorn of strength. Constipation, liver and kidney complaint and nervousness are conquered by it.

Mysterious Glass Balls.

The small island of Billiton, between Sumatra and Borneo, has long been famous for its rich tin mines, which are controlled by the Dutch government. In describing the geology of Billiton before the Royal Academy of Sciences in Amsterdam recently Mr. Verbeek gave an account of the mysterious "glass balls of Billiton," which are found among some of the tin ore deposits. They are round, with grooved surfaces. Similar balls are occasionally found in Borneo and Java, as well as in Australia. Mr. Verbeek thinks they cannot be artificial, and there are no volcanoes near enough to support the theory that they are volcanic bombs. Besides, he says, the glassy rocks produced by the nearest volcanoes are quite different in their nature from the material of the balls. He suspected that the mysterious objects were ejected ages ago from the volcanoes of the moon and afterward fell upon the earth.

A Summer Cure.

In a news item in The Sun a doctor is quoted as saying that a day's abstention from food will cure summer complaint. Some years ago the writer cured dysentery of several weeks' duration by taking a few wineglassful doses of the following formula at half hour intervals—viz, a tablespoonful of table salt and two of cider vinegar in a pint of water. The relief was permanent. The remedy was recently used by a person suffering from a customary summer complaint, and two doses effected a cure of the complaint.—E. R. D. in New York Sun.

The late Duke of Marlborough, in alluding to the size of Blenheim palace, used to say, by way of a joke, that it was the only residence in England which required $4,000 worth of putty a year to keep the window panes in order.

Tomintoul, in Banffshire, Scotland, is the highest village above sea level in Scotland—if not in Britain. Until recently this village was comparatively unknown in the tourist world.

Within the last decade the population of Europe has increased by about 30,000,000, of whom Russia contributed 12,510,000 and France only 67,000.

A FAMOUS BAKERY.

How the Bollands Became Cakemakers For the Royal Family.

In one of the old buildings which bear the architectural imprint of Queen Anne's time in Chester, England, is a bakeshop—not an ordinary bakeshop, for the royal arms jut out from the second story, and immediately above is a sign bearing the name "Bollands." And the proximity of the sign to the royal arms is no idle commercial myth to insnare new customers.

In the annals of the tradesfolk of Chester there never was a greater man than Richard Bolland, the original owner of the bakeshop. In 1836 the Duchess of Kent and her young daughter, the Princess Victoria, visited the city for the purpose of officially opening a new bridge that was to bring all kinds of importance and prosperity to the town. Of course it was an immense event for Chester, and every one did something to make the visit of the great folks memorable.

Richard Bolland was ambitious, but poor, and he churned his brains mightily to devise some attractive method of showing his loyal appreciation of the visit. In a happy moment he decided to make some small cakes of transcendent excellence, put them in a fancy box and present them to the young princess.

Happy thought! Potent cakes! Great Bolland!

The next year the little princess, whose palate had been enchanted by the flavor of the Chester cakes, became queen of England, and one of the first acts after her accession in 1837 was the appointment of Bolland as one of the queen's warrant holders. So much for the power of a box of small cakes.

How long the flavor of those cakes lingered in the royal memory is shown by the fact that 25 years later, when the Prince of Wales was to be married, Victoria gave a commission to Bolland to prepare the wedding cake for that great event. It was no ordinary wedding cake that Mr. Bolland produced either, and its exhibition earned him such tremendous fame that every English bride of wealth and prominence who has married since then has had the Chester baker prepare her wedding cake.

Descendants of the original Bolland now conduct the shop, but they use the same recipe that proved so successful in the days of Victoria's childhood, and still bake cakes for the royal family.—Philadelphia Press.

The Leper and the Flagstone.

One of the principal legends connected with St. Patrick's altar stone, according to a writer in Donahoe's Magazine, is called the "Legend of the Leper and the Flagstone." This story runs as follows: When St. Patrick was embarking for Ireland to enter upon his mission, a poor leper came to the seashore just as the ship was about to weigh anchor and earnestly begged to be taken on board. It is probable that he had heard something of the holiness of the saint and the proofs of divine favor conferred upon him, and that deep within his inner consciousness there was born a hope, vague at first, but gradually growing stronger, that in the company of St. Patrick he might expect some amelioration of his pitiable condition. Something in the man appealed to the saint, who was so deeply touched by his pleadings that he expressed a wish to have the despised leper taken on board, but fear and prejudice had such an influence over the sailors that they would not allow the leper on board, and the ship began to move out while the afflicted man continued to plead from the beach. The saint took his altar stone and cast it on the water within reach of the leper, telling him to sit on it and remain perfectly quiet. Again was the faith of the man shown, and as soon as he had seated himself the stone began to move over the water. It followed immediately in the wake of the ship until it reached the harbor of Wicklow, and the leper thus reached the shores of Erin in safety. St. Patrick again took possession of the stone.

HER PICTURES ON SALE.

Embarrassing Discovery Made by New Orleans Society Beauty.

Mrs. Edward Bright, one of the most beautiful of the society leaders of New Orleans, has just succeeded in buying up a large stock of her own photographs, which were offered for public sale in many retail shops in this city. Mrs. Bright, who as Miss Ella Mehle was the belle of New Orleans, was a queen of the Mardi Gras and was photographed in her costume. In some way the negative escaped from the hands of the photographer and found its way to New York. Prints were made of it for the purpose of illustrating a new process of photography. Of course nobody knew who the beautiful original was, and the prints were scattered broadcast. So long as the picture went to the photograph trade only, Mrs. Bright did not hear of it. But when some enterprising photographer reproduced it in large sizes, labeled it "A Southern Beauty," and sold it to fancy shops, which offered the pictures for sale at 15 cents a copy, Mrs. Bright's friends in New York soon wrote to her about the matter, and the lady was naturally indignant. Her husband engaged a detective and ordered him to buy up all the copies he could. Disguised as a peddler of photographs he purchased all that were offered for sale. When he chanced into the shop of a dealer named Rosenbaum, in Park row, he found 600 of the prints. These had been bought at auction for $3. When the detective offered to take the lot Rosenbaum demanded $33, which was promptly paid. Then the dealer told the detective that he had a bundle of pictures of two more "Southern beauties," but when they came to be examined they were found to be not society women, but concert hall performers in New Orleans, in whom the detective was not interested. Now that the story is out, it is probable the supply of Mrs. Bright's pictures will increase and the offerings be so large as to go beyond the capacity of Mr. Bright's bank account to pay for.

MRS. EDWARD BRIGHT.

LOCKS YOUR COAT AND HAT.

Invention to Prevent Theft and Mistakes in Public Places.

Sneak thieves who have been harvesting hats, coats and umbrellas from hooks in restaurants, barber shops, and other places will find something to thwart them in an invention just patented by a Chicago barber. The device is a combination hat, coat and umbrella hanger, which locks securely apparel placed in it and foils any attempt of a sneak thief to purloin the hat, coat, or umbrella of another without breaking the hook and attracting attention.

SAFETY COAT AND HAT HANGER.

After a hat and coat have been hung on the lower arm of the device and the umbrella placed in its place the upper arm is brought down on the hat and coat, this movement also fastening the umbrella, and then the key is withdrawn. Each lock has a key of its own and no mistake can be made in taking another's clothing. This latter mistake is of frequent occurrence in public places, and it is thought by the inventor he has solved the problem of preventing such mistakes.

In a restaurant where the new device is on trial one picks out one of the new hooks on the wall, places hat, coat and umbrella in it, brings down the upper arm, withdraws the key, which then goes into the vest pocket, and proceeds to eat. After the meal the key is used to release the apparel. The mistake of keeping the key cannot be made, for after withdrawing the apparel the lock retains the key.

Oom Paul's New Coach.

President Kruger, of the Transvaal, has so far departed from his usual simplicity in matters of this kind as to order from London a state carriage which, it is said, will cost him no less than $3,500. The arms of the South African republic will be painted upon the panels of the doors; silver eagles, the national emblem, will pose with spread wings upon the silver lamps and upon the four corners of the upper part of the carriage, and the interior will be lined with light blue satin.

GREAT SEPOY REVOLT

INSURRECTION NEARLY LOST INDIA TO ENGLAND.

The Rebels Were Six to One and Precipitated Frightful Outrages—The Awful Massacre at Cawnpore and the Siege of Lucknow.

War in India.

The disturbance in the Indian empire brings to mind the atrocities of the last Sepoy revolt and causes civilization to shrink from a repetition of such horrors.

The Indian mutiny of 1857 was brought on by many and varied causes. The immediate provocation was the serving out of greased cartridges to the Sepoy troops, who regarded the presence of the fat of cows and pigs in the cartridges as an insult to their religious customs and beliefs. But the prime, the fundamental, cause was that the native forces were much too large relatively to the European. There was only one European soldier to six native soldiers. Thus becoming aware of the fact that in their hands resided the great balance of power, it was not difficult for the natives to find some pretext for an insurrection. The rebel troops were not only great in numbers, but their equipment and discipline was fully equal to that of the European forces. At first the insurgents were scattered over the country in tribes, who continued to harass the European residents by despoiling their property and taking the lives of the men, while the women and children were tortured to death. But as the revolt became more general the rebels concentrated their forces under one leader, Nana Sahab, who with many able subordinates organized the strongest insurrectionary force the world has ever seen. The whole fighting strength of the mutineers was not less than 242,000 men, while the European forces in India at that time did not exceed 40,000. So great was the disaprity between the opposing forces that it seemed as if the English forces would be almost enveloped by the insurgents.

The first organized outbreak took place on May 10, when the rebels marched upon the city of Delhi and butchered hundreds of the English residents. About the same time uprisings took place in many parts of the northwest provinces, and much destruction was wrought. The whole country was inflamed with war. After numerous engagements in which much blood was shed on both sides, the forces of Nana Sahib marched upon Cawpnore. At that time there were about 1,000 Europeans in this city, of whom 500 were women and children. The overwhelming numbers of the Sepoys soon overcame the paltry handful of English troops, the city was entered and many lives were taken. The residents surrendered under the promise that they should not be harmed. They were put into boats and thought they were being sent as prisoners to Allahabad. But no sooner had the boats left the shore than they were fired upon by the rebel troops, and of the whole number only four men escaped.

The women and children were reserved for a more cruel fate. Hearing that Gen. Havelock was within two days march of Cawnpore, Nana Sahib marched out to meet him. He was forced by Sir Havelock's forces to fall back upon Cawnpore. When he saw there was some danger of being defeated the rebel leader gave orders for the women and children to be put to death. With fiendish ferocity characteristic of their nature they soon devised a mode of torture which was as effective as it was terrible. An old well was found, and after being run through with spears or hacked with swords, the helpless women and innocent children were hurled headlong into the well. Havelock and his army arrived just in time to be too late to rescue the women and children. He and his men were horrified to see the awful death which had been meted out to these poor unfortunates.

The struggle went on in other parts of the country. Although the British forces were far outnumbered, they were nevertheless firm and dogged in their resistance to the enemy. Many of the rebels were cut to pieces, many were taken prisoners, and many more were forced to capitulate. On May 30 and 31 the troops of Lucknow, the capital, mutinied, and soon every Sepoy regiment in Oude followed their example. The rebel forces organized an attack upon the city that was stubbornly resisted by the European troops within. Night and day the gallant defenders were forced to stand at the loopholes and pour forth a deadly fire upon the bloodthirsty insurgents. Hearing of the beleagured condition of the town, Sir Henry Havelock crossed the Ganges and marched upon Lucknow. Before reaching the town he fought eight victorious battles, at the end of which time his forces were so overcome by fatigue and were so few in numbers that he was in doubt as to whether to proceed. Just at this time Sir James Outram arrived, and, thus re-enforced, they marched upon Lucknow, Gen. Havelock in command. They fought their way through the besieging lines and to the delight of the almost worn-out defenders entered the city. But as the force within was now strengthened so the rebel forces increased their energy and fought more vigorously than ever for an entrance into the capital. But the British fought manfully and held out against the foe. In November Sir Colin Campbell arrived, and the insurgents were compelled to raise the siege. By this time England had put fresh forces in the field, and ere long British supremacy asserted itself. The Sepoys were disarmed and placed under English surveillance, and soon law and order was restored. But it was a dearly bought victory. Many precious lives had been sacrificed, and much treasure had been spent.

Keeping His Word.

"You will remember," said the vaudeville performer on salary day, "that you said you'd take me on trial."

"Yes," said the manager.

"And if I suited, you said you'd pay me big money."

"Oh, yes; so I did. Here you are. Fifteen silver dollars. I always keep my word. If you find any bigger money in circulation than the silver dollar, let me know and I'll have this changed for you."

THE GARROTE.

Spain's Horrifying Method of Executing Condemned Murderers.

The garrote by which the anarchist who killed the Spanish premier was executed is named after its inventor, a Spanish ironworker, who witnessed a bungling execution of a relative on the gallows, which was the method employed by Spain up to about thirty years ago for carrying out the sentence of death.

Garrote wondered that a more expeditious and, therefore, merciful method had not been discovered. He little thought then that he would be the one to furnish his country with a substitute for the gallows, but the thought haunted him so long that he at length found it assuming ordered form in his mind, and in time the ponderous death-dealing machine that has immortalized him in his country came to be a fact.

The two points of excellence claimed for the garrote are these: That it can be made with reasonable care to kill instantly, and that it sheds not one drop of blood. Force that is measured by horse power is the agency it employs and its aim is the breaking of the victim's neck.

The unfortunate is first made to sit in a chair directly under two heavy iron bars, one of which is adjusted on the back of his neck, and the other, vulgarly known as the corbatin, or neck tie, under his chin. Then the executioner grasps the handle, gives a vigorous twist, and death is instantaneous. The entire machine is made of iron and ordinarily weighs several hundred pounds.

Persons who have witnessed all sorts of capital punishment are unanimous in the opinion that garroting is the most revolting and appalling of all. It is not always as expeditious as its inventor made it possible to be. A vicious executioner can prolong it practically at will, and herein is the system's great drawback, as it is now constituted. Cases are citable in which the process was prolonged twenty, thirty minutes, even three-quarters of an hour! The executioner merely gave twist enough to the handle or lever to choke his victim. Then he turned it back and twisted again, this time a little more than at first, and so on until his spite, having been satisfied, or his instructions, perhaps, obeyed, he gave one final turn and ended the tortured life. Such was the execution of Maloja, in Matanzas, Cuba, in 1888!—New York Journal.

How One Physician Vaccinates.

Dr. John B. Read, an old practitioner of fifty years' experience, and county health officer at Tuscaloosa, Ala., made public the other day his formula for vaccination, which, he says, he has never known to fail. The process is simple. Take a fine needle and thread with silk or cotton thread, and moisten about one-fourth of an inch of the thread with vaccine matter or virus; then draw the needle through the skin until that portion of the thread containing the virus is passed under the skin; then clip both ends of the thread, leaving the portion with the virus under the skin. Dr. Read says the idea originated with him in his early practice and has never been made public before.—Nashville Banner.

No Umpire Required.

He was feeling sentimental and he dropped into the guiding star and loadstone of hope strain.

"I feel," he said, "that with you to cheer and urge me on I could win any prize that the great arena of life has to offer."

"Let me understand you," she said. "You want me to get on the coaching line and whoop things up while you make your run."

"Er—that is the idea," he said, a little surprised.

"Then," she said, "the grounds will have to be laid off in a little better shape. So far I haven't been able to see the diamond."

He caught on sufficiently to bring the ring the next night, and the game went right on in spite of the darkness.

The Printer Coined a Word.

The old proofreader was holding forth upon the question of typographical errors and their occasional influence on posterity. "The word 'hoodlum' is an instance of this," he said. "Out in San Francisco twenty-five years ago there was a notorious character named Muldoon, who was the leader of a gang of young ruffians. They were a terror to the community and about as tough a lot of citizens as you could find on the coast. A reporter who had been assigned to a story in which they had figured, undertook to coin a word designating the gang. He reversed the name of the leader and referred to them as 'Noodlums.' The compositor mistook the n for an h, and as hoodlums the word passed the proofreader. And now 'hoodlum' is a recognized word and will probably survive."

Fed His Arm to a Tiger.

Col. Sir Edward Bradford, the veteran military man who is now the chief of the metropolitan police of London, has an empty sleeve. Years ago, while an officer in India, Sir Edward was a very keen sportsman, with a strong liking for that most dangerous of all pastimes—tiger shooting. One day, while engaged in this hazardous diversion, he fired at a tiger, which, only wounded, charged upon him, and bore him to the ground. Never losing his presence of mind for a moment, the intrepid hunter, with a view to preventing the infuriated animal from attacking his head, thrust within his jaws his left arm. The tiger simply gnawed it off, but the life of the cool nimrod was saved by his comrades, who arrived in time to shoot the creature before it had time to inflict any more serious injury upon Sir Edward.

Lively Wall Street.

The 600 odd brokers in Wall street split up $500,000 one week recently. The big exchange has about 1,100 members on its roll, but no more than 600 are active, and the busy ones got the spoils. The days of $5 and $10 tips to messengers may be coming back as of old. It means so much more money put into circulation instead of staying in the strong boxes of the men and women who have been hugging their money close. In the prosperous days of the street even the modest broker spends $1 or $2 or $3 for his lunch, and the pop of the wine bottle is as merry as it is incessant. Wall street is just now well worth a visit.

AN INDICTMENT.

Low browed woman that stole my love,
Fairer than I, less true,
You fooled him first with your wily tongue
And your eyes' deceitful blue.

You looked in his till you made him swear
His first love was all a dream,
While you let him toy with your yellow hair
And bask in your smile's false gleam.

Welladay for your eyes so bright!
Weeping has made mine dim.
You would smile on, though he lay in his grave—
I could have died for him.

His Connection.

Bannister, the comedian, was presented to a proud old Scotch dame. "Who are the Bannisters?" she asked peevishly. "I do not recollect meeting with them before." "Madam," replied the actor gravely, "we are closely connected with the Stairs." "Ah, there is a good and ancient family!" cried madam. "Mr. Bannister, I am delighted to make your acquaintance."—Household Words.

A New York contemporary asserts that "half the kissing is only habit." The other half probably is sugar or divorce, depending upon circumstances.

A reporter for the New York Journal has been interviewing Mormon women concerning polygamy and states that one of the plural wives asserts that polygamy is a blessing to both men and women. She also says, "A man loves all his wives." Perhaps he does, but it is an odd specimen of womanhood that can care for a man who is capable of loving "any old thing" or one who divides his heart up into sections, as it were.

Vienna's gigantic wheel has been erected by British workmen in charge of a London engineer at a cost of $300,000. It is more elegantly fitted up than the Ferris wheel, and contains thirty compartments, with room for 600 passengers, who are carried to a height of 840 feet, giving a bird's-eye view of Vienna and stretches of the Danube. The wheel is driven by an electric motor with a smooth and agreeable motion.

The news from Klondike of late is not calculated to encourage expeditions to that far-famed land of gold. Those who contemplate the terrible journey should pause and think seriously whether the risk is worth the prospect of wealth and at least conclude that the far Alaskan gold fields are not pleasant as a dwelling place and that half a loaf beside a good fire is much better than a whole one that lies beyond the danger line of ice and frost.

Secretary Wilson is still working on his plan to produce a breed of horses for the European armies. When we give Europe the horses and the grain to feed them, provisions of all kinds for the soldiers, armor for battle ships and, possibly, in the near future, the ships themselves, as well as guns and high explosives for the armies, about the only thing left will be to fight their battles for them, and doubtless there are enterprising Americans who would take that contract also for a sufficient consideration.

Rainmakers in this country have been apparently inactive this season, but a drought would have revived interest in their plans and theories. In Europe their experiments have attracted more attention. Germany offers a reward of $2,500 to any one who can produce a downpour of rain at moderate expense. It is suggested that inventors in this line should also discover how to stop excessive rains, with resulting floods. The favorite devices for rainmaking thus far are cannon explosives, balloons that burst at an elevation, compressed gasses and electric connections between the clouds and the earth.

Is it a compliment or a treat to this country that England is constantly strengthening her naval forces in American waters? Every ship on the North American and West Indian stations whose term of service expires is replaced by a more formidable one, and great sums are being expended in improving docks and harbor defenses. Why this display of strength? Surely it is not for the protection of Canada; the most hopeless pessimist in the Dominion cannot fear an attack from the United States. But there is scarcely more reason to fear an attack on the United States by Great Britain. Probably the true and simple explanation is that the British Government is building larger vessels now than it did formerly, and, having them on hand, is sending them to foreign stations in the usual routine.

The danger that lies in the use of inflammable hair washes, and which has already manifested itself in the death of two women in the city of London, has induced so eminent a scientist as Lord Kelvin to write a letter upon the subject, which was regarded of enough importance to be published in the London Times. The washes that have been responsible for these disasters are composed chiefly of gasoline or benzine, and are used by hairdressers to remove the natural oil that will collect in the hair of a healthful person. During such cleaning process explosions have followed and death has in two notable instances resulted. Lord Kelvin says that the explosion was due to an electric spark generated by rubbing or handling the hair. All persons are familiar with the experiment of producing electric sparks by stroking a cat's back, and Lord Kelvin holds that the evaporation of the benzine forms, with the air, an explosive gas that may be easily ignited by an electric spark. He says: "Ignition of vapor of benzine by electric spark is well known to dyers in their process for cleaning silks and other fabrics by boiling in large cauldrons of liquid benzine. When the goods are taken out of the cauldron and spread out to dry on a table explosions have often taken place, and I believe it is quite certain that an electric spark, caused by some slight friction between dried and partially dried portions of the fabrics, is the incendiary." Since the absence of a flame or a fire in a room does not insure immunity from these terrible accidents the ladies had better resort to the use of some other agent for cleaning the hair than those, the basis of which is an inflammable liquid that generates a gas easily exploded by an electric spark.

CHILDREN IN THE TEMPLE OF HOME.

When I hear the children's laughter,
From a neighbor's home, next door,
First a little laugh, then after
Breaking out into a roar,
Notes of heavenly music bringing,
To a weary brain and heart,
Their laughing, frolics, singing,
Send warmth and joy to my heart.

How those little souls are swelling,
With childhood's mirth and glee,
A pleasant story telling
Of memories dear to me;
How still I sit and listen
To the merry voice and song,
Until my moist eyes glisten,
At thoughts of days by-gone

Dear children of all ages,
While you are children still,
Before your dog-star rages,
Have pleasure as you will;
Be mirthful, bright and jolly,
But let your childhood's mirt
Be free from sin and folly,
And full of earnest worth.

When years are tinged with sorrow,
And the bloom of youth is gone,
When each to-day and morrow
Have heart-beats sad and lone,
When the world grows cold and colder,
When the weight of years is pressed,
When the head droops to the shoulder,
And fain would be at rest,

When you would life's burdens lighten,
And gladly lay them down,
Let memory come to brighten
Your path to a hoped-for crown,
Seek out a group of the youthful,
Where laughter, song and story
Are honest, pure and truthful,
And life is crowned with glory.

THE WHITE MAN'S GARDEN.

When Jonathan Marston died he left his estate, real and personal, to Selina, his Creole wife. Rumor had it that the said Selina was originally a slave, bought by Jonathan to do the cooking for his establishment. Rumor may have been right or wrong, but when the Creole widow came into her inheritance she held everything with a tight hand, and the slaves of her cotton plantation soon felt the change.

Marston himself, whatever his faults may have been, never stinted the slaves in corncakes or objected to breakdowns when occasion seemed to demand them; but his widow changed all that. She could tell to a nicety how much corn it took to keep the soul alive in the body of a "brack" fellow, and her ideas of slavery were of the most cogent kind.

Peter Davis, bondman forever to the Creole, could not understand the change. Certainly, Mrs. Marston had always carried her head very high, even in her husband's days, perhaps because she wished to be thought pure white. If any one knew the Creole's history Peter did, for he was a slave of Jonathan when she was bought and married by her master. Pete said nothing; he was discreet, for he valued his position as a sort of overseer on the plantation. Why Mrs. Marston hated him from the first he never troubled to inquire, but when he fell into her hands the first acts she performed were to give him all the most difficult and disagreeable tasks she could find. From being the most honored slave, Pete soon became the drudge of the others. When he pleaded for more corn, Mrs. Marston promptly sent him to the public whippers with a smart sum to pay for a sound flogging.

After the disgrace which fell upon him Pete was a changed man. He ceased to laugh and sing in the cotton rows, and shook whenever Mrs. Marston was close by. If it had not been for Dinah, the slave of the next plantation, he would have made a dash for liberty. Pete was in love with Dinah, and many a time had the moonlight fallen upon the two as they stole a precious hour from the night to wander through leafy ways together. Jonathan Marston had promised Pete his freedom; but, somehow, he never found the opportunity to sign the needful papers—and now the Creole widow reigned in his stead. Pete's love chapter seemed about to close.

There was one thing about all the change of circumstances which Pete could not endure—hunger. He had a very fine physique, but before long he grew noticeably thin. It may have been worry that affected Pete in this way, but worry was not in his vocabulary. Consequently, Pete thought the whole question out, and the conclusion to which he came was that Mrs. Marston was morally bound to find him food. Having come to this definite conclusion, Pete stole out the same night from his little hut, which he had still to himself, and when he returned he drew from under his ragged jacket a plump chicken. Fear made Pete suspicious, so he kept his secret all to himself, as well as the chicken.

The theft passed unnoticed, and Pete, emboldened by success, repeated it. Out of about a hundred and fifty fowls, nearly thirty had gone to supply the place of the corncakes which the Creole widow stinted Pete of.

On the thirtieth occasion Pete, to his infinite dismay on discovering it, made a blunder. The night was a dark one, and the fowls, quiet as Pete was, cackled, so the thief hastily took the nearest, wrung its neck, and made all haste back to his hut. There, by the aid of a fire he had kindled beneath a pot waiting to cook the chicken in, Pete discovered that the slain chicken was yellow and not black. The yellow chicken was the only one Mrs. Marston possessed of that color; all the rest were black, and this particular chicken, Pete knew, would be missed when the Creole widow fed them next morning.

Pete was almost in despair; only the odor of well-boiled fowl brought him to a sense of his physical needs. All that Pete left of the yellow hen was the bones and claws, which he carefully cremated, and then went to sleep.

The very next morning Mrs. Marston missed the yellow hen, and then counted the others. There were thirty missing, and her wrath was fearful to see. She closely questioned the negroes on her plantation, male and female, as to what they knew about her loss.

When Mrs. Marston came to Pete, who stood halfway in the straggling line in which the slaves were drawn up, she eyed him closely.

"Pete," she said, sharply, "I cotch er smile in yo' eye! Yo' is de t'ief!"

Pete turned as pale as his skin would allow, while his heart, if his own narrative be worthy of credence, went plump against the chicken lying inside him.

"Mis' Marston," said Pete, "I didn't see yaller hen las' night, I——"

"P'raps not, Pete, dough yo' eat dat hen and twenty-nine along uv her!" the Creole answered.

Pete's blood was us. He thought of old Master Marston and of the change his Creole widow had made.

"Massa Marston he lie under de tuff, ur he mought er forgiben er niggah fer stealin' ef dat niggah gits like's ef he w'ars his boans inside out!"

The Creole looked at Pete as if she could have whipped him with her own hands.

"Yo niggah!" she cried. "Yo' speak to a pure white leddy like dat? I'se Mis' Marston, who owns every boan in yo' t'leven' brack body. I'd like ter have you whipped agin, but I don't go ter spile de hide uv er niggah wuth hundreds uv dollahs—so I'se goin' ter sell yo'! An' Peblo, de wust planter in Virginny, wants yo' bad, an' he'll bid high fer yo' carcass! Yo' odder niggahs disremember dis as a wahnin'!"

Mrs. Marston turned and walked towards her house, leaving Pete plunged in the depths of stony despair. He sat down upon a stone, while the other slaves tried to console him, but in vain. At last Pete got up and went on with his work in the cotton row, but his brawny limbs trembled with fear of Peblo, the Spanish planter.

That night the clouds dispersed, and in the light of the stars Pete made his way to the nearest planter's, Jackson's, house. He rattled the hasp of the back door. A smart-looking negress, in a striped cotton dress, opened the door.

"Dinah," said Pete, "come out, come out! It's fer de las' time."

"Am dat you, Pete?" the girl said, and their lips met.

Pete, as soon as he found the necessary courage, told her what had happened. Then she said quickly and tearfully:

"Yo', Pete! yo's t'ief! Er 'spectable cullur'd leddy didn't oughter be mairred ter yo'!"

After a time Dinah's anger calmed down, and as the two stood talking the sound of footsteps drew near, and then Dinah's master, Jackson, came upon the lovers.

"Why, you black niggers!" he said, with a queer little catch in his voice, "aren't you ashamed of yourselves, hugging and kissing each other like that where the stars can see you, and which know that neither of you has any right to do so, not being whites!"

Dinah turned with all the pathos of a white woman in her voice as she answered:

"No, sah; 'ca'se dis yer's my man Pete! He's bin gone an' gobbled up Mis' Marston's yaller hen, an' is ter be sold termorer fer it! Like's not we nebber meet agin in dis worl', an' 'pears ter me we mought have er dyin' kiss ter think on, till we meets whar niggers is white, an' ain't sold, but is ransomed uv de Lord!"

"Sho!" said Jackson, surprised at this outburst from the usually patient Dinah. "And so you're going to be sold, are you, Pete?"

Pete explained that Peblo was expected to bid for him.

"Then you'd better say your prayers!" laughed Jackson. "Pete," he added, "what's your black body worth, eh?"

"Eight hundred dollars, about massa," said Pete, with a quiver of his lips.

"That's the worth of you, is it?" asked Jackson, reflectively; "a good deal more than I'm personally worth. Anyhow, it serves you right; a thief must expect to be sold, and I shall come to the sale to-morrow, and enjoy the fun of seeing your price toted up—and I'll bring Dinah, too. Now, Dinah, just go in and shut the door!" But Jackson went in himself first.

Daylight found Pete sitting in his hut with his hands clasped and pressed against his knees. Mrs. Marston sent for him.

"Go an' be sold, yo' t'ief!" said the Creole when Pete entered her presence; and he was taken a short distance, where all preparations had been made for a sale of negroes.

To make matters worse for Pete, Dinah was there, and, jostling her way through the crowd, she went up to him, saying:

"Pete, yo's t'ief! So yo's gwine ter be sold."

A number of planters went up to Pete, opening his jaws to see his teeth, and feeling the whipcord of his arms.

The sale dragged its way along till Pete's turn came. He was mounted on a barrel, and the auctioneer, a puffy-faced man who spoke with all the peculiarities of a Virginian slave himself, explained the nature of the article for disposal.

"Pete Davis, single, 25, er bondman forever ter Mis' Marston, an' de papers ter dat effec' is here ter be handed roun' ter bidders."

The documents were duly examined, after which the auctioneer continued:

"Now, who say $500 ter fix de start?"

"That's bid for me!" said a hatchet-faced Spaniard. It was Peblo. Pete shook like a leaf.

The bidding immediately began briskly:

"Five hundred"—"and fifty"—"six hundred"—"and fifty"—"seven hundred"—"eight hundred"—"and fifty"—"nine hundred"—"and twenty dollars!"

There was a silence. Peblo's last bid had been $900. The other bid was against his. He threw away a cigar, half smoked, and then said, "Nine hundred and fifty dollars, Mr. Auctioneer!"

"One thousand dollars!" said some one on the edge of the ragged crowd.

Peblo did not bid again. Pete's body was not worth it.

"Gwine for a thousan' dollahs, Pete Davis, good strong niggah—gwine—las' bid—er thousan' bid—gwine, gwine—Pete Davis sold fer er thousan' dollahs, gen'lemen. A big price, but he's worth it—and dirt cheap!" The auctioneer smiled upon the bidders, then told his clerk to enter the sale.

"Who's he sold ter?" the auctioneer asked.

"Ter me!" cried a colored girl, pushing her way through the crowd. It was Dinah.

There was a laugh raised against the auctioneer, in the midst of which Peblo called out:

"Pete Davis's mine! This girl ain't free; she can't bid!"

At that moment Jackson came forward.

"This girl can bid; for she is free, Mr. Auctioneer," he said, quietly. "I gave her her freedom this morning, and to every one else on my plantation. Pete Davis is hers. Dinah, go and get your nigger!"

Pete got down from the barrel amid a dead silence. Dinah led him away like a man in a dream. Suddenly he seemed to recover his senses, and, turning abruptly, he ran to where Jackson still stood, discussing Lincoln's plan to liberate the slaves. Pete flung himself at Jackson's feet, pouring forth a deluge of incoherent thanks. His liberator—for Dinah did not buy Pete with any but Jackson's money—pushed the slave aside and walked thoughtfully to his own plantation.

An easy-going man, Jackson knew that by his act of liberating his slaves he had ruined himself. He called them together and divided his plantation among them, settling it with a lawyer, whose services he had requisitioned.

Three days after that Pete, busy in fencing off Dinah's share, caught his nakek feet against something hard. He stooped to pick it up, finding, to his horror, that it was a revolver, and held in a stiffened hand. In a moment Pete was down in the tangle of grass and weeds of the ditch whence projected the dead hand. Jackson was lying there upon his back, fallen a victim to his own act.

Pete is the oldest planter, they say, in Virginia; but Dinah still lives to help him tend the flowers which grow so profusely upon a mound in his possessions. There, when summer nights are cool and long, the planters gather a few choice negro kindred spirits, and they talk of slavery days and what he did in them—he who lies under the mound which Pete has long called The White Man's Garden.—Temple Magazine.

Women in the Profession.

Hundreds of college-bred women have been, and are, capably and efficiently engaged in teaching, and a few have gained a certain distinction as presidents and professors in colleges for women, but no great and original educator has come from among them. Occasionally a determined young graduate gets a foothold in a newspaper office, and usually keeps it with credit to herself and her higher education, yet the few women editors of eminence have not been college-bred, and there is nothing to be gained by concealing the fact that the college women who have undertaken journalism seem, as yet, to have had no influence in sweetening the flood of sensational and nasty print for which the newspaper women of the country must bear their share of discredit with the newspaper men.

The number of college women who have taken up medicine is considerable—some of them, no doubt, from a real love of science, and some for love of a career. While their work has been able and their success undoubted, it is just to say that they have not contributed originally to medical science. There are a few women collegians in law, in literature, in the pulpit and in other professions, and their helpfulness and enthusiasm have been especially noticeable in educational and philanthropic work. In all these fields of usefulness the work of college women, "taken by and large," has been good, honest, competent work, about like that of the average industrious man; but it has been derivative, not creative; complemental, not brilliant; offering little opportunity for sex celebration on the part of those enthusiasts who believe that women have needed only diploma and a ballot to be brilliantly equipped for conquering all the world that men have left unconquered.—Scribner's.

Another Iliad.

The following story, from the Washington Post, proves what hardly needs proving, that a man may handle books without being a scholar.

It wasn't in the book-stall of a department store; it was in a real bookstore; a bookstore, moreover, where you would expect to find salesmen who know books. A friend of mine went in the other day and asked for Pope's "Iliad." The salesman went away to look for it. Presently he returned with a book in his hand.

"We haven't Pope's 'Iliad,'" he said, "but we have an 'Iliad.' It's by Homer, though."

Regular Habits.

Of a Tennessean 78 years old who attended a Methodist conference at Murray, Ky., it is said that he never drank coffee, bought a drink of whisky, or been ill. Neither has any of his seven children been ill. His wife, it is said, has never missed cooking a meal. To this record of deadly monotony is added the statement that the man has never missed a district meeting, and has attended 156 quarterly church meetings

A HARVEST OF HUMAN HAIR

Millions of Pounds Every Year Get Tangled Up in Commerce.

Perhaps there is no staple article about which less is known by the average person than human hair as an article of commerce. It will doubtless surprise many when it is stated that the dealers in human hair goods do not depend on chance clippings here and there, but that there is a regular hair harvest that can always be relied upon. It is estimated that over 12,000,000 pounds of human hair are used annually in the civilized world or adorning the heads of women. In New York city alone over four tons of this class of goods are imported yearly.

"Not a little of the hair used in this country," said a New York dealer to the writer, "comes from the heads of American women and is fully as fine in shade and texture as the imported article. We had a big harvest during the craze that the fair sex had not long ago for having their hair cut short. Many thousands of women who then had their locks sheared have since bitterly regretted it, as in many instances their hair has grown so slowly that they have been compelled to wear a wig or a switch since the fashion changed. After the majority of women reach the age of thirty the hair seems to partially lose its vigor, and if cut it will not grow long again.

"Two-thirds of the ladies nowadays use false hair more or less. The decree of fashion, or the charm, is the reason, of course. One woman, for instance, has a high forehead and wishes to reduce it in appearance. Another has worn off the front hair by continued frizzing, and would like to conceal the fact. Both make use of a front or top piece, with a choice of many styles.

"Ladies' wigs cost from $20 to $200. Half wigs, top pieces and switches, from $10 to $50, according to quality.

"The largest supply of hair comes from Switzerland, Germany, and the French provinces. There is a human hair market in Merlans, in the department of the lower Pyrenees, held every Friday. Hundreds of hair traders walk up and down the one street of the village, their shears dangling from their belts, and inspect the braids which the peasant girls, standing on the steps of the houses, let down for inspection. If a bargain is struck the hair is cut, and the money paid on the spot, the price varying from 60 cents to $5 in our money.

"A woman's hair may grow to the length of six feet. And I know a lady who has been offered and refused $500 for her crown of glory, which is over six feet long. A single female hair will bear up a weight of four ounces without breaking, but the hair thus heavily weighted must be dark brown, for blonde hair breaks under a strain of two and one-half ounces. There are some 2,000 importers, manufacturers and dealers in human hair in the United States.

GERMANY'S NEW AMBASSADOR.

A Diplomat Who Once Before Represented the Kaiser at Washington.

Dr. von Holleben, who comes to Washington as the ambassador from Germany, is one of the best known diplomats in Europe. The doctor is also well known and highly esteemed in Washington, where he filled the post of German minister from March, 1892, to September, 1893. The mission was then raised to an embassy, and Dr. von Holleben was replaced by Ambassador Saurma-Jelisch. The new ambassador is highly educated and a most suave man. He speaks English with as much fluency as a born American or Englishman, and during his stay in Washington five years ago he won many friends in Washington society, where he was known as one of the few bachelors of the diplomatic corps. Dr. von Holleben has had a wide and varied experience as a diplomat. He has represented Germany at Santiago de Chile and at Tokio. That was before his appointment to the American mission. He is about 55 years old and has an inclination toward the pleasures of literature. He will replace Baron von Thielman, who is to be secretary of the German treasury. Dr. von Holleben is now minister at Stuttgart.

DR. VON HOLLEBEN.

Oom Paul's New Coach.

President Kruger, of the Transvaal, has so far departed from his usual simplicity in matters of this kind as to order from London a state carriage which, it is said, will cost him no less than $3,500. The arms of the South African republic will be painted upon the panels of the doors; silver eagles, the national emblem, will pose with spread wings upon the silver lamps and upon the four corners of the upper part of the carriage, and the interior will be lined with light blue satin.

A KLONDIKE FABLE.

The Miner with the Gold and the Man with the Meats.

The Klondike gold miner wrapped his furs around him and put a bit between his teeth to keep them from chattering. He looked at his pocket thermometer. It was so cold the thing had burst.

"Ugh," he muttered, taking out the bit for a moment, "it's cold here, but you bet I've got the stuff."

He kicked a large bag in front of him containing dust of the paltry sum of $185,000. Then he sighed.

"Not enough for a square meal," he muttered.

With new energy the toiler arose and prepared to sink a new shaft. Urged on by the pangs of hunger he sunk through 85 feet of solid ice, and by the aid of 2,000 pounds of dynamite blew a hole in the earth two feet deep.

Before him lay glittering nuggets. Anywhere else but in Klondike he would have had to go deeper.

With nervous hand he scooped them up and climbed to the top of his ice shaft. For a moment he gazed at the peaceful scene around him. The aurora borealis was just getting in its work.

But he could not eat the aurora borealis.

In feverish haste he counted up his wealth. Together with the trifle in his bag he estimated $896,000.

"Alas," he cried, "I am still a poor man."

Just then a man drawing a dog sledge passed his way. The miner's eye glistened as he saw a meat parcel protruding from the passerby's pocket. He hailed the new-comer.

"What have you there?" he asked. "You see before you a man who has had nothing but ice to eat for twelve days. I would pay any price for a square meal."

The sledge man expressed his sympathy, but remarked that business was business. He showed the miner a pound of bacon, and the miner's eye glittered for the third time.

Then without a word he handed over his meager $896,000 savings and grasped the bacon. The man in the sledge drove on.

"At least," said the miner, as he buried his teeth in the toothsome morsel, "I have kept the wolf from the door for another day."—Denver Times.

Fresh Air for a Bed-Fast Patient.

"As all the world knows, there is no more perfect means of ventilation than an open fire," writes Mrs. Burton Kingsland, telling how to nurse the sick, in the Ladies' Home Journal. "It is continuous and attended with no danger of draught. A more equable temperature is obtained with wood than with coal, and the thermometer should be frequently consulted in a sick-room. As fresh air is the best tonic, it is said that a window may be opened at the top on a sunny day, no matter how ill the patient be, if in the opening a wooden frame covered with flannel is fitted. The air strained through the woolen material is deprived of all power to harm. An umbrella covered with a shawl makes a good screen when the windows are open, the patient being sheltered under it as if in a tent. A folding clothes-horse may also be utilized as a screen frame. As a person lying on his back is deprived of the protection of his eyelids from the light, the blinds and curtains should be adjusted with regard to that fact. A room a little shaded is more restful to a person in illness, but if a patch of sunshine can be let in somewhere in the room it makes a cheery spot to turn to if so minded. The Italian proverb says, 'Where the sun does not enter the doctor does.'"

Cuts Like Cheese.

Nature has made it easy to build houses in Bermuda. The entire group of islands is made up of coral rock, so that every man can have a quarry in his back yard if he cares to dig deep enough. This stone, when first cut, is soft and white, so that it "cuts like cheese," and can be got out in square blocks with an ordinary hand saw. On exposure to the air, however, it soon becomes dark, and hard enough to break the teeth out of the saw that cut it so easily from its bed.

As there is no lumber in Bermuda except that which is brought from Canada at considerable expense, stone is used for nearly the entire house. The walls are laid in blocks about eight inches by six, and two feet in length. Window sills and door jambs are also sawed out of stone in the proper shape, and even the roof is covered with stone shingles, which are made simply by setting a block of soft, fresh stone on edge and sawing it into thin slabs. Both roof and walls have to be kept white-washed, or the stone would crumble away, hard as it finally becomes; but with this precaution it lasts a long time. There is an old coral stone house in Harrington sound which is considerably over 200 years old.

Coral islands are formed by the coral polyps, or insects, which build up reefs to about the level of the sea and then die. On the rough surface of the reefs seaweed clings. The wind and the waves work together to grind up their substance and pile it in heaps of sand, which finally solidifies into the rock which can be cut so easily.

Locks.

Tradition says that locks were made in England in the reign of Alfred, but it was not till the fourteenth century that the craft was recognized as a distinct one. In the reign of Elizabeth locks with bells or chimes were so constructed as to ring an alarm or play a tune when they were tampered with. In the sixteenth century, in Germany and France, as well as in England, the art of the locksmith was at its highest perfection, and the keys were truly artistic, with escutcheons, armorial insignia ornaments and piercings upon the end to be grasped by the hand.

Minook Creek is said to be rich. It is also said not to be rich. However, as both statements are made by people who do not know anything about it there is no reason why anybody should decline to entertain the view that may happen best to please him.

It is hard to understand why no capitalist is willing to take the lead in the matter of establishing a smelter in Southern California. High-priced fuel, since the recent marvelous development of the oil fields, can no longer be urged as an objection. A trainload of ore en route to Pueblo is a sorry compliment to our boasted enterprise.

Says the Randsburg Miner: While workmen were digging holes for telephone poles on Butte avenue yesterday a ledge of very rich ore was struck just below Orth's hardware store. Felix Donnelly, W. T. Grant and F. C. Descent were horning some rock at the time close by where the hole was being dug, and they tried some of the rock thrown out and found it very rich. They immediately put up a monument and located the ledge, and propose to begin development work on it at once. Randsburg is not the heavenly city, but her streets are literally paved with gold.

Banker J. E. Crooks of Haywards has a level head. He is president of the board of trustees of the Union High School of that town, and in an address to the teachers a few days since, among other things said:

After your appointment as a teacher the first thing you do call on the local editor and pay him $2 for his paper. They are usually weekly papers. This will be the best investment you can make in that town. You will henceforth be spoken of as a very able educator and your class will be pointed out to the community as a model one. Try it.

If Banker Crooks' ideas are all as sound as this one, the Haywards High School has a brilliant future.

Charles F. Shinn of the Agricultural Department of the State University gives the following report of his experiments in the reclamation of alkali lands:

"The land, some of which is the worst alkali land in the state, has been treated with gypsum, and during the coming season over three hundred kinds of seeds will be planted in the ground. A crop of wheat is expected where before the reclamation of the land barley grew only an inch high.

"We are showing the people that even on a small scale the land can be profitably reclaimed in this manner. Of course, if all the farmers would adopt the method the reclamation of the alkali lands would be much easier and cheaper.

"We have discovered that much can done to neutralize the effect of the alkali by mechanical treatment of the soil. By using straw—not manure, for that makes alkali soil even worse—the ground is kept warm and the cold alkali kept from rotting the seed.

"Our experience with the 'Atriplex semi-baccalum," or salt bush, have also proved that without reclamation, alkali lands can be made valuable for pasture. Within the last three or four years we have distributed at least one thousand pounds of the seed all over the state. The salt bush makes a thick growth six or seven inches high and makes most excellent grazing for sheep. The excellence of the Australian wool is due very largely to the abundance of salt bush upon which the sheep graze. On the karroos of South Africa the salt bush has been planted for sheep pasture by several companies.

"The planting of the salt bush promises to establish a new industry in California. Already there is a large demand for the seed even from Mexico. The bush grows where alfalfa will not, and in many cases, perhaps, it will be cheaper to plant it than to attempt to reclaim the land."

The loan of £16,000,000 which China has made for the building of railways and the development of resources is the first real step in an undertaking to which the lifework of Li Hung Chang has been devoted. Unhappily for the old Viceroy, he himself may have no part in the direction of the work, for age and infirmities have served to take him out of active life, and it may even be that the lever of progress will be put in the hands of a personal enemy. But whatever may be done to bring China into the atmosphere of modern progress will be primarily to the credit of this one man, who, rising far above the dead level of Chinese conservatism, fought for twenty years to make China see its duty to itself.

One of the strangest proofs of the irony of fate, however, is in the fact that Li Hung Chang, after preparing the ground, resisted most stoutly and with no other honorable recourse, the one series of events that hastened the era that he longed for. He did not want war with Japan. His influence went for peace so strongly that he fell into disgrace at court. Yet had his way been followed China must have relapsed into its sloth and dreams, from which, rudely shaken by the jar and fright of battle, it emerged as an eager and inquisitive searcher for the sources of modern national strength and power. If the war did great things for Japan it did more for China. The awakening of the old empire began on the day that Port Arthur fell, and now the railroads which Li Hung Chang hoped and planned for, the mines that he wanted to open, the markets he labored to create and the wealth he urged China to extract from her latent resources, are all among the probable acquirements of the years about to follow.

Saved by a Felt Hat.

In one of the holiday parties that camped last summer on the shore of Lake Geneva there was a boy who was never long out of mischief. If a porcupine was found under the boards in the girls' tent, or if there was gunpowder in the camp kettle, or if the hammock broke down suddenly under suspicious circumstances, every one said quite promptly, "That's Jimmie again," but ordinarily Jimmie wasn't there to hear the remarks that followed.

But, like other boys who play jokes, Jimmie sometimes found himself joked.

One day he crept out on the pier behind his little sister with the intention of frightening her.

"Boo!" he shouted.

But instead of jumping away and screaming, as Jimmie had fondly expected, she pitched over backward, and in trying to catch her Jimmie lost his footing and fell into the water. There was no place to cling on the slippery, slimy sides of the pier, and down, down he went.

But Jimmie was as quick to think of other things as he was of jokes. The day before he had heard his uncle telling about a man who saved himself from drowning with a hat.

Jimmie had on a soft felt hat, and as he came to the surface he quickly pulled it off, placed it upon the water rim down, and with his arm around it pressed it slightly to his breast. The air in the crown served to buoy him up while he yelled lustily for help.

When the other members of the party came running to the rescue, they found Jimmie floating comfortably and steadying himself against the pier.

"Don't hurry," he said quite calmly. "I'm using uncle's life preserver."—Chicago Record.

The Doll's Funeral.

When my dolly died, when my dolly died,
I sat on the step and I cried, and I cried,
And I couldn't eat any jam and bread
'Cause it didn't seem right when my doll was dead.
And Bridget was sorry as she could be,
For she patted my head, and "Oh," said she,
"To think that the pretty has gone and died!"
Then I broke out afresh, and I cried and cried.

And all the dollies from all around
Came to see my doll put under the ground.
There were Lucy Lee and Mary Clack
Brought their dolls over all dressed in black.
And Emmeline Hope and Sara Lou
Came over and brought their dollies too.
And all the time I cried and cried
'Cause it hurt me so when my dolly died.

We dressed her up in a new white gown,
With ribbon and laces all around,
And made her coffin in a box
Where my brother keeps his spelling blocks,
And we had some prayers, and a funeral, too,
And our hymn was "The Two Little Girls In Blue."
But for me, I only cried and cried
'Cause it truly hurt when my dolly died.

We dug her a grave in the violet bed
And planted violets at her head,
And we raised a stone and wrote quite plain,
"Here lies a dear doll who died of pain."
And then my brother he said "Amen!"
And we all went back to the house again.
But all the time I cried and cried
Because 'twas right when my doll had died.

And then we had more jam and bread,
But I didn't eat 'cause my doll was dead.
But I tied some crape on my dollhouse door,
And then I cried and cried some more.
I couldn't be happy, don't you see,
Because the funeral belonged to me.
And then the others went home, and then
I went out and dug up my doll again.

Searchlight is king of pacing three-year-olds. His time made on the track at Santa Ana, October 30, in an exhibition mile eclipses all previous records and puts him at the head of pacers for his age. With a running mate he was driven by Tom Keating and established as his record 2:05¾. His time at the quarter was :31, at the half 1:02½, and at the three-quarters 1:34½. He went the whole mile without a skip or break, his driver discarding the whip and coaxing him on with his voice. When the grand stand was passed the crowd saluted with great cheering, which broke out again when the time, 2:05¾, was announced.

A New Dry Concentrator.

The Wood concentrator is built somewhat on the basic plan of the old-time dry-washer, the gold and sulphurets being separated from the pulp by agitation, causing openings or crevices in the latter which permits the heavier particles to fall by specific gravity to the riffle board. With the dry washer the blast which separated the pulp and mineral could not be regulated, but with the concentrator this is governed altogether by the operator. The ore is dumped from the wagons into a bin, where it is fed by an automatic feeder into the crusher, and as the pulp leaves the crusher it is taken by elevators to the cupola of the mill building, where it passes through a 100, 80 and 60 mesh rotary screen. Should any of the pulp be too coarse to pass through the 60 mesh it runs into a tube and is carried back into the crusher. Below the screen is a bin which catches the pulp as it falls, and from this pipes lead into the hoppers of the machines. An eccentric feed and automatic gate in the hopper regulates the flow into the sand chamber. This chamber must be kept full at all times. From the sand chamber the pulp drops upon the riffle board, which is made of silk bolting cloth, and across which wires are sewed on at intervals of half an inch. The riffle travels upward at almost a snail's pace towards the hopper, and below it the blast is placed in a tight-fitting compartment. The blast is variable, and can be regulated by the operator from naught to nine, according to the character of the ore treated, that carrying heavy gold and sulphurets requiring a light blast, and vice versa. As the pulp passes over the riffles interstices are caused by the blast, through which the gold and sulphurets are carried by gravity to the bottom and are held by the cross wires, while the pulp, which now becomes tailings, except for the chlorides and light gold, passes downward to the back of the machine, where another blast forces these lighter particles into two pipes arranged on each side of the machine, and carries them into the chloride house, an air-tight building erected outside of the mill. So far the percentage of chlorides and light gold has been so small that it could scarcely be treated.

The gold and sulphurets, after being deposited against the riffles, are carried over the front of the machine and deposited in a box set for the purpose. The small amount of concentrates which may cling to the riffles is carried under the machine and is knocked off on to a blanket by a "knocker" automatically arranged.

The concentrating power of the machine is governed altogether by the operator, who, by raising or lowering the tables on which the riffles are arranged, can reduce the concentrates to a minimum or permit them to carry a large percentage of pulp. With rich ore the reduction may be only five, ten or twenty into one, while with low-grade ore it may be run from forty to 800 into one. During a test run this week a reduction of 800 to 1 was made on some $1.25 rock, and the concentrates assayed $879 to the ton, while an assay of the tailings in one instance showed nothing, and in another a trace of gold.

The machines cover a floor space of 3x6 feet. Each machine is claimed to be capable of handling ten tons of ore in twenty-four hours, and a two horse-power gasoline engine furnishes power enough to run four of them. During the mill tests the lowest percentage saved was 71½ and the highest 98.

On the desert the success of the concentrator opens up, it is believed, a new chapter in mining there, for in the past ores that ran less than $20 per ton were consigned to the waste dump.

The Alameda plant consists of four machines, and thus far has cost about $12,000. Two shifts of three men each will be able to handle forty tons of ore every twenty-four hours.

The Railroad

Ramish & Marsh, the railroad contractors, were in town Tuesday, and from them we learned that the graders were at work on the fourteenth mile that day, and that there were already six miles of track laid. Mr. Ramish left by way of Mojave Tuesday afternoon for Los Angeles, but before he went arrangements were completed for moving the grading camp to a point between Johannesburg and the St. Elmo. This move will be made in a few days, when the water supply will be taken from this end of the line.

Mr. Marsh assured us the road would be completed and in operation by the first of December, which will be good news to the many whose business necessitates frequent trips between Randsburg and the other centers of civilization. Some delay has been occasioned by the non-arrival of bolts and other necessary material, but in spite of this the road is making commendable progress, and we will soon hear the sound of the locomotive.—Randsburg Miner.

One Week More.

The Record-Union says: "Mr. Oxnard has extended the time for securing the necessary subscription of ten thousand acres as a condition precedent to establishing a beet sugar refinery in Sacramento county to November 1st. There are needed 4000 acres more. If Sacramento does not subscribe them in the next seven days we lose an industry that would be of benefit to every man, woman and child in the entire county. A week is a short time, but it must be used to the very best advantage. San Joaquin and Fresno counties, Yolo and Solano counties stand ready to snatch the plum from our lips. Shall we confess inability to grasp a prize similar to those which have done so much for Southern California and for some of the coast counties, where such establishments have caused millions of dollars to be disbursed in the country communities?

A Hebrew Colony.

The first successful attempt at colonizing the lands of Nevada was consummated in San Francisco last week. For some time M. Cohn and T. R. Hofer of Carson have been working on a plan to get a large number of families to come to Nevada and settle on the Wymore ranch, which they proposed to cut up into small places that could be tilled by a small family. Recently a Hebrew colonist wrote to Governor Sadler, asking what the outlook was in Nevada, and Cohn and Hofer grasped the opportunity and were soon in communication with the colonists. The details were completed last week, and signatures of 17 families were secured. There will, however, be two or three more before they arrive, and in all the party will consist of about 150 people.

These people will arrive in Nevada next month. It is the intention of the colonists to plant 400 acres in grain this year yet, and until 1898 has become firmly established on the calendar the place will be run to a certain extent, the incorporation papers being already filed.

The property consists of 5,500 acres of the finest land in this section of Nevada, about 900 acres of which are under cultivation, with all the water that ever could be wanted, and some good buildings, and the colonists will at once commence the erection of residences.

The land is near the town of Wellington, in Lyon county. Great quantities of fruit are now raised on the land, and the colonists will pay considerable attention to this industry.

While the terms given the colonists are not made public, it is understood they are liberal. The people who are coming to be citizens of Nevada are from Tulare and Contra Costa counties, where they have kept up the fight for a living for several years without success. Most of them had to pay $90 an acre for the land, and this sum is prohibitive for the man who has to borrow money. Water has been scarce with them, and crops were a failure.

Some of the difficulties encountered by the Carson men in endeavoring to induce California people to locate in this State were aggravating. The general idea seemed to be that Nevada was nothing but alkali and sand. The thought that fruit and grain were brought in from some outside source and simply labeled here. One man asked if it was true that we had 20 feet of snow here in the winter. Such questions were asked by intelligent men, and they will find in Nevada a hearty welcome, rich soil, and a climate unsurpassed.

This is really the best news the State has had for some time, for it needs but a start to turn the tide of immigration this way, and population is the one essential thing for our future welfare.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

James G. Maguire gives voice to the following sentiment in the Examiner:

"It is quite probable that my name will be submitted to the next Democratic State Convention as a candidate for Governor. If nominated I will certainly be pleased to accept, but I will make no combinations, nor will I make any promises, other than those contained in the published platform, in order to secure the nomination.

"I am not a candidate for the office in any sense involving the manipulation of county committees or conventions, or primary elections, in order to secure friendly delegates. I want a free and untrammeled State Convention, standing for Democratic principles, unfalteringly, and seeking the strongest candidate to represent those principles. To such a convention I would submit my name and abide by its judgment. No other kind of Democratic convention can nominate the next Governor. I do not know that I am or that I will be, the strongest candidate. No man's judgment of his own popularity is of any value. But the general opinion of free and honest delegates from every county in the State will be right on all such questions, and the party's strength depends upon their being free and honest in their choice and acsions. A programmed convention is always an abomination, and in the Democratic party it always invites and generally secures defeat in California.

The town of Bakersfield is again discussing the subject of incorporation. The leading women of the place have enlisted themselves in the cause, and the Californian declares that there is no more potent factor in the community than the Woman's Club, and that its determination to make incorporation an issue is directly in line with the aims and purposes of the organization. Their interest and influence in the movement will insure it a support in quarters where heretofore there has been only an antagonism which led to defeat.

An International Engagement.

"Announcement is made," says the Boston Transcript, "of the engagement of Sir John Ainsworth, her majesty's special commissioner in British east Africa, to Miss Ina Scott, formerly of West Philadelphia. Miss Scott is a sister of the late Rev. P. Cameron Scott, who was director and founder of the African Inland mission. She went out to Africa under the auspices of the Philadelphia missionary council a little more than a year ago with her father and mother, her sister, Miss Margaret, being already on the missionary field. Sir John Ainsworth took a deep interest in the work of the mission and aided materially in the foundation of mission stations. He formed a close attachment for the earnest young missionary, the Rev. P. Cameron Scott, who died on the missionary field last winter. Sir John and Lady Ainsworth will probably not remain in British east Africa. They are now at Machaki, but it is expected that Sir John will return to England at the close of his special governmental mission in Africa."

The Movable Carriage Wheel Guard.

Movable carriage wheel guards are made chiefly for use with light carriages that are not equipped with fixed guards. The movable guard is of willow basket work. In its general outlines it is something like a coat or cloak hanger. It is made to fit over a section of the rim of the wheel. The carriage guard is carried in the carriage, and when required for use to protect the gown of a woman getting in or out it is simply held on the wheel.—Exchange.

Butler and Hoar.

Ben Butler, in a case in the Massachusetts supreme court involving damages for fatal injury, Senator Hoar being on the other side, quoted Job, "All that a man hath will he give for his life." "That," said Mr. Hoar, "was a plea of the devil in a motion for a new trial, and I don't think the court will be more impressed by it on account of its modern indorsement."

Fresh, ripe fruits are excellent for purifying the blood and toning up the system. As specific remedies oranges are aperient. Sour oranges are highly recommended for rheumatism.

RECALLED BY TELEGRAPHER

Attraction of a Scene In a Play Suggests a Story.

When "Secret Service" was first produced in New York, the audiences for the first week or two included a large number of telegraph operators, attracted by the vivid description given of the scene in which Gillette sends the message and is shot through the hand. Interest in this part of the play waned slightly, so far as the knights of the key were concerned, when it was found that the telegraphing, while it sounded very real to the uninitiated, was nothing but a succession of meaningless clicks.

Why it was expected that there should be real telegraphing any more than there should be real killing on the stage was explained by an old operator recently. "There lingers in the mind of all the older men in the business," said he, "the memory of the telegraphing scene in Oliver Doud Byron's play, 'Across the Continent,' in which a genuine operator was substituted for the actor long enough to tick out a welcome to any member of the profession who might be in the audience. It was at Mrs. John Drew's old Arch Street theater in Philadelphia, about 15 years ago. Every night the man on the stage would spell out: 'Good evening, boys! If you are all feeling well, rap out an answer on the iron support of the seat in front of you. All together, now—one, two, three. Go!'

"The rest of the audience were bewildered by the ticking all over the house, and it was great fun for the boys and a shrewd move on the part of the management, for it attracted telegraphers in great force. They enjoyed the puzzled expression of the people, who couldn't understand the unanimity of the answer from the gallery, orchestra and lobby. Of course the talk between the stage and the house was not confined to this salutation. It was on all sorts of topics, usually in the form of an interrogation, with a request for a simultaneous answer. The story has been told to the younger men, and whenever a play is produced in which a telegraph key figures they like to see if the experience will be repeated."—New York Mail and Express.

Worth Saving.

The people of Belgium evidently believe in training their children in habits of economy. Possibly no better method of convincing the young folks of the wisdom of looking after small things could have been found than that resorted to in the public schools of Brussels. The Outlook gives the result of the experiment:

Some time ago the children were requested by their teachers to gather up all the waste and apparently useless articles that they could find on their way to and from school and to deliver them to their respective teachers.

For eight months the work of collection went on. Such objects as tin foil, tin cans, paint tubes, bottle capsules and refuse metal were especially looked after. The result was astonishing. Nineteen hundred and twenty-five pounds of tin foil rewarded the children's efforts, together with 1,200 pounds of metal scraps, 4,400 pounds of bottle capsules and old paint tubes that in the aggregate weighed 220 pounds.

But it was when the articles were disposed of and the money applied to useful objects that the full force of this economy was manifest. The proceeds completely clothed 500 poor children and sent 90 invalid children to recuperation colonies, and there was a goodly balance left to be distributed among the sick poor of the city.

THINGS PERTAINING TO THE FARM AND HOME.

By Reducing Bones to Ashes a Valuable Plant Food Is Found—Best to Grow Early Corn—How to Have Success with Fertilizers.

Early Corn Is Best.

Millions of dollars' worth of corn is lost every year from failure of corn late planted, or planted on too poor ground to mature its crop. This soft corn has some feeding value, but more for ruminant animals than for the hog, which gets most of it. But even when put to the best use the nutrition is not in the soft corn as it is in the fully ripened grain. Not even remastication can get out of soft corn what is not there. Even in the arid West, where corn dries up prematurely, the earliest planted corn fares best. When the hot winds come which wither the immature corn to almost nothing, the corn that has formed ear and grain has so much saved beyond even the power of the hot winds to wholly dissipate. Hence we always advise the early planting of corn. Even if the frost nips the blade just as it is pushing above the surface, there is vigor enough in the root to send out a new shoot. It is rather more serious if the frost catches corn when it is five or six inches high. Then the frozen leaf has often to be clipped off before a new growth will start. Sometimes corn even thus frozen down matures a better crop than that from corn planted after the frost was over. The root has been growing even while the top was frozen. Hence, though such corn would never have quite as big stalks as that which grew without interruption, it would have large and well-filled ears. Most of the stalks would have suckers, and these also would be well cared. Early corn always has more grain than late in proportion to its stalk growth.

Bones and Ashes.

Bones, as they are, are not available as food for the farmer's crops; therefore, he takes no interest in them, and they are suffered to lie about the farm unnoticed. This writer says to buy bone meal is very handy, but this does not justify the farmer in neglecting so valuable a home recsource for plant food. If you reduce the bones that accumulate on the farm to dust, you have a genuine article. Mr. Halket says, after numerous trials between what is called green bones with all the marrow and fat in them, and dry bone, he found the dry bone raised the best crops. Of all the matters of which bones are composed, there is not a single particle which is not a direct constitutent or food for plants. Thus we see, when we reduce them to available food, it is all good.

Now, it is but little trouble to have barrels placed conveniently to receive the ashes from the house and tobacco barns, and you will find that it takes but little time to collect all bones, both large and small, that are lying about the farm, giving it an unsightly appearance. Do not be afraid of them. A man that is too nice to take hold of bones will not make much progress in farming. Save all the beef and hog bones when killed. Put a good layer of ashes at the bottom of a barrel, then a layer of bones, and so on until nearly full; then fill with ashes. Keep the mass wet, but not enough to leach. Use soapsuds if convenient. Do not suffer the mass to freeze, as the process will stop while frozen. While dissolving bones with ashes is a slow process, it is simple, and requires no great care, and while you are about your farm work, you are making fertilizers that are valuable. Not only this, but I think the mixture of the bones and ashes is more valuable as a manure than either by itself.—Ohio Farmer.

Cultivating After Rains.

Much the best time to cultivate is after a rainfall which has packed the surface soil, provided time enough has elapsed for the surface to dry. Heavy soils are rich in mineral plant food, and this as the water evaporates is left on the surface as a crust which effectually excludes light and air. When this crust is turned under it is dissolved by the moisture and makes a rich food for plants. Besides, the cultivation opens the soil to receive air, thus drying the soil and turning the air itself into moisture. This enormously increases available plant food in the soil. Besides, the loose soil on the surface which the cultivator leaves prevents too rapid evaporation, and thus makes the soil both warmer and moister than it would be if uncultivated.

Red Pepper for Poultry.

The habit of dosing fowls with various hot condiments in order to improve their condition is very like similar habits in human beings. It is likely to result in permanent loss of health. Only when chicks or old fowls are sick is it allowable to use such means to restore health, and then only medicinally and for one or two doses. If chickens are chilled by being draggled through the wet, two or three small pieces of red pepper will excite the internal organs to action. Then if food is eaten it will be digested and no more dosing will be needed. Some people dose fowl with pepper in cold weather to keep them warm. If fowls are out of condition and moping in winter it is more likely lack of gravel or broken clam shells to fill their gizzards with and enable them to digest food than for any other reason. In summer time no grown fowl that runs at large needs any condiments to keep it healthy.

Cheaper Growing of Beets.

It is a mistake to plant field beets in narrow rows, so that all the work has to be done by hand. There is a little hand labor needed while the plants are small, but after that all the work of cultivation can be best done with the cultivator. If the horse is careful and steady a width of two feet between the rows is sufficient for all the kinds of beets. But their tops will grow so large as to completely shade the soil between. The mangel wurtzel grow still larger and had better be planted in rows two feet six inches or two feet ten inches apart, and thinned to ten inches apart in the rows. Even at this distance the mangel tops will completely shade the ground, and the roots will grow so that they will nearly or quite touch each other. By thus using horse labor for cultivation the beet crop may be very easily and cheaply grown.

Storing Eggs.

Eggs should not be stored near any odorous commodity, as they have almost the proclivity of butter for absorbing odors. Especial care should be taken in shipping. In one instance, a shipment of eggs was placed near a large shipment of apples on the ship and became almost unsalable, because it was complained that they had the odor of apples. Pickled eggs are not so apt to be affected by odors as other eggs. In the pickling there seems to be a deposit of the shells which tends to fill the pores; perhaps that is the reason why the shells of pickled eggs are almost always burst when boiled.

Salt Aids Digestion.

Salt in moderate amounts is doubtless an aid to digestion. The craving for it is natural with all herbiverous animals, and is especially strong in those that chew the cud. If cows are not salted regularly the cream from their milk will not make butter so quickly. This is possibly because lack of salt allows food in the stomach to ferment before it can be digested. This always causes fever and increases the caseine in the milk. The same result is caused by the change in fall from green feed to dry. Cows should be salted at least twice a week. It is better still to keep some where they always can have access to it. They will not eat too much for their good.

Some Government Experiments.

The United States Government has made some experiments with bisulphide of carbon in order to learn the effects of the substance on seeds that have been exposed to it in sealed vessels. An exposure of forty-eight hours failed to injure the germinating qualities of peas, beans, cotton, kaffir corn, buckwheat, turnip, cabbage, cauliflower, pumpkin, cow pea and oats. Such an exposure is too long, however, twenty-four hours being sufficient, the result proving the destruction of weevil and any insect that may be in th seeds. The germinating quality was decreased in barley, wheat, rye, corn, rice, millet and crimson clover. It is believed that an exposure of only twenty-four hours will not injure any seeds, as the tests made were very severe and such as would not be necessary as a practice.

Success with Fertilizers.

The impression that the mere application of a few pounds of fertilizers to a poor soil is all that is necessary to make it produce a large crop has now about disappeared from the mind of the average farmer. This wisdom has been gained from experience. The three great essentials, which have most to do with the successful culture of the soil, are good cultivation, proper rotation and judicious fertilization. The three requisites mentioned are mutually dependent upon one another. If the soil is in the best physical condition, and this can only be brought about by thorough cultivation, it affords a better opportunity for the plant roots to forage about in search of food. Furthermore, it admits the passage of air and enables the water to move freely, and unless the soil admits of such, the plant is retarded in its growth, which, of course, means a reduction in the yield.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Farm Notes.

When trees are pruned of surplus branches and shoots while they are young it avoids the cutting off of large limbs in after years.

An old sheep keeper says that good fat sheep never lose their wool. Wool is lost through lice, ticks or scab, due to a mite, and none of these beasts can endure fat. Poor sheep is always their feeding ground.

Fine butter has its origin farther back than the churn. The quality which most affects the price is the flavor. Unless this is beyond criticism there can be no expectation of a gilt-edge price. The flavor of the butter depends on the milk, and the flavor of the milk upon the food, the health and surroundings of the cows.

When cows have been bred and appear to be barren the cause is usually that they have been made too fat or kept too closely in the barnyard without exercise. It is a waste of food to give cows grain twice a day if they are not in full flow of milk. When very fat the cows will do best on a pasture of scanty herbage, on which they must travel about for their food.

Farmers dislike sheep on some pastures, as a flock on scanty herbage will graze so close to the ground as to injure some varieties of grasses, but the close grazing by sheep is an advantage in their favor, as they keep down the weeds just as they are appearing above the soil. Weeds that are of no value as food when they have matured provide dainties to sheep when the shoots are young and tender.

The varieties of cantaloupes differ very much. Those that are the most attractive in appearance may be deficient in quality. The little Jenny Lind and Netted Gem are of fine flavor and excellent quality, but are small. One of the best varieties is the Emerald Gem, which is of medium size, dark in apearance of rind and not very attractive, but is always a favorite with those who grow it. As soon as ripe the melon loosens itself from the vine, a peculiarity of the Emerald Gem only.

When the pasture is bare of shade the cows undergo a severe ordeal on warm days. During the time a cow is eating from the pasture she simply stores the food until she is supplied, when she then masticates it, which process is known as "chewing the cud." This she likes to do in a quiet, shady place. If comfortable, she may perform the operation several times during the day, eating a large quantity, and consequently producing more milk than if uncomfortable. If the pasture has no shade an open shed will be serviceable.

Mme. Patti's Dread of Burglars.

Burglars are the great terror of Mme. Patti's life at Craig-y-Nos Castle, and she has had all the window shutters fitted with electric bells, which start ringing at the slightest touch, while by the same machinery a gun is fired and a number of dogs are let loose in the grounds. Special watchmen are told off every night on "round" duty.

A TRUE BEAR STORY.

A Yellowstone Park Bruin Gives a Great Moral Lesson to Parents.

Speaking of law and the enforcement of discipline in Yellowstone Park, I heard the story of a bear there, which I consider exceedingly important not only as a comment on the discipline of the park, but as a moral lesson to parents in domestic obedience. The story is literally true, and if it were not I should not repeat it, for it would have no value. Mr. Kipling says "the law of the jungle is—obey." This also seems to be the law of Yellowstone Park. There is a lunch station at the upper basin, near Old Faithful, kept by a very intelligent and ingenious man. He got acquainted last year with a she bear, who used to come to his house every day and walk into the kitchen for food for herself and her two cubs. The cubs never came. The keeper got on very intimate terms with the bear, who was always civil and well-behaved, and would take food from his hand (without taking the hand). One day toward sunset the bear came to the kitchen and having received her portion she went out of the back door to carry it to her cubs. To her surprise and anger the cubs were there waiting for her. She laid down the food, and rushed at her infants and gave them a rousing spanking. "She did not cuff them; she spanked them," and then drove them back into the woods, cuffing them and knocking them at every step. When she reached the spot where she had told them to wait, she left them there and returned to the house. And there she stayed in the kitchen for two whole hours, making the disobedient children wait for their food, simply to discipline them and teach them obedience. The explanation is very natural. When the bear leaves her young in a particular place and goes in search of food for them, if they stray away in her absence she has great difficulty in finding them. The mother knew that the safety of her cubs and her own peace of mind depended upon strict discipline in the family. Oh, that we had more such mothers in the United States!—Harper's Magazine.

England Growing Impatient.

The London Spectator, during the course of a long and temperate article on the "Provocative and unfriendly tone of American politicians of both parties toward England," says:

"We are obliged to write as we never dreamed of being forced to write about a country only less dear to us than our own. But we should fail in our public duty if we did not point out in the strongest manner the grave risks which are likely to ensue from this attitude. Unless the United States assumes a very different tone the gravest crisis is certain to ensue.

"Public opinion in England has greatly changed during the last few months, and even if Lord Salisbury is anxious to politely ignore such indiscretions as Secretary Sherman's, the people would not permit it, and hereafter American demands, if urged in unfriendly language, will be resisted unanimously by the nation, no matter what the risks may be. If America does not keep a better watch over her politicians they will hurry her into a conflict with this country whereof no one is able to see the end."

The Champion in Frugality.

Guy, the founder of Guy's Hospital in London, was as parsimonious in private life as he was munificent in public. A good story illustrative of this is told of him in connection with John Hopkins, one of his contemporaries, who was nicknamed Vulture Hopkins on account of his rapacious mode of acquiring his immense wealth. On one occasion he paid a visit to Guy, who, on Hopkins entering the room, lighted a farthing candle. Hopkins, on being asked the reason of his visit, said: "I have been told that you, sir, are better versed in the prudent and necessary art of saving than any man living, and I therefore wait on you for a lesson in frugality. I have always regarded myself as an adept in this matter, but I am told that you excel me." "Oh," replied Guy, "if that is all you came to talk about we can discuss the matter in the dark," and thereupon he blew out the candle. Struck with this example of economy, Hopkins acknowledged that he had met his superior in thrift.

What Was Lacking.

Anyone who had not seen the woman with an angry eye wobble just before she dismounted from her wheel would have taken her for an experienced rider, a heroine of century runs. She strode with majestic confidence through the store, and so impressed another woman that she forgot herself and let the newcomer be waited on first.

"I suppose," she said to the clerk, "that I looked rather new at bicycling, and you thought that there wasn't very much use of bothering about me, because I wouldn't know the difference anyhow."

The clerk assured her to the contrary, and said he was sure there was some misunderstanding.

"There was a misunderstanding," she answered. "I understood that when I bought this repair kit I was getting all that a repair kit ought to contain."

"Certainly," he answered. "Isn't it all right?"

"Didn't you expressly state that it contained everything that would be required for repairs in an ordinary accident?"

"Yes."

"And I bought it with that implied guarantee, didn't I?"

"Undeniably, you did."

"And if things don't turn out just as you represented them it's your business to make good the deficiency?"

"I suppose so."

"All right. There's your repair kit. You can either put in a paper of pins and some sticking plaster or else give me back my money."—Washington Star.

Regular Habits.

Of a Tennessean 78 years old who attended a Methodist conference at Murray, Ky., it is said that he never drank coffee, bought a drink of whisky, or been ill. Neither has any of his seven children been ill. His wife, it is said, has never missed cooking a meal. To this record of deadly monotony is added the statement that the man has never missed a district meeting, and has attended 156 quarterly church meetings.

Bending Cardboard.

An English inventor—name or location we do not find given—is said to have contrived a tool capable of being attached to any machine or apparatus having a transversing slide and a fixed table that will bend cardboard without the need of a score cut, thus preserving the full strength of the material at the bend. The tool in question is formed of metal or wood and is in two parts, one having a recess on one edge and the other a straight edge, having the upper edge rounded off to fit into the recess on the edge of the first part, allowing space between equal to the thickness of the substance to be bent—the length of the straight edge to be made to the longest bend required. In using the tool, the second mentioned part is made a fixture to the table machine frame or apparatus and the first part is attached to the traversing portion. By placing the cardboard to be bent on the straight edge, then sliding the second part over and along the board under a certain amount of pressure, a bend in the card will be produced.—New York Sun.

Archbishop Janssens.

The late Archbishop Janssens of New Orleans left an estate of only about $6,000, which he inherited from his father, and three-fourths of it he bequeathed for religious and charitable purposes. He was entitled to a handsome salary for years, but drew barely enough to pay the actual expenses for his simple living, having allowed the remainder to accumulate to pay off the debt of the diocese.

CAMPING OUT.

Now that midsummer days are here,
And hours are long and skies are clear,
'Tis time to leave the crowded street
For distant woodlands cool and sweet;
There pitch the tent near by a brook
Where trout swim hungry for the hook,
There loaf and hunt and read, and live
In manner plain and primative,
Enjoying Nature as a bird
Enjoys her—every sign and word
Interpreting, until the heart,
Of Nature's own becomes a part.

Of rugged rocks an oven rude—
The hearthstone of your solitude—
Suffices well to cook your fish
And lend a flavor to the dish;
Or yet to send the fragrance up
Of spicy coffee from the cup.

What joy to waken with the sun
And find the fresh grass overspun
With webs of gossamer, and see
The sunbeams steal from tree to tree,
Dropping their gold along the way,
To guide the shining feet of Day!

Then when the breakfast hour is o'er,
To loiter down along the shore
With rod and line, and tempt the trout
From his retreat to venture out!

Perchance a book would best beguile—
Then lie down where the sun can smile
Upon you reading, prose or rhyme,
The wood-stream singing all the time,
Above you birds, around you flowers—
Heedless be now the flying hours!

Or distant mountain heights may urge
Your feet to find the dizzy verge
Whence, looking forth, the world you know
Liet outstretched in God's hand below,
And you, the master of it all,
A speck infinitesimal!

Ah, it is good just once to see
The finite with Infinity—
To see and feel and comprehend
A little the All-loving Friend!

Now back again, the fires are lit
And round the blaze the comrades sit
Exchanging stories, weaving tales,
Until Invention flags and fails.
Then Slumber calls them to recline
On fragrant pillows of the pine—
To sleep and dream and wake to be Grateful to God who made them free!

THE MOONSHINER.

Two horsemen were trotting slowly adown a narrow path that wound along the Kentucky ridge of the Cumberland mountains. Their horses were ridden out, and the men had but little to say. One of them hailed from New York. His face bespoke energy and a strong will, but the rugged features inspired little confidence. His companion, as could be seen at a glance, was an Englishman. The fair, ruddy complexion, the quaintly-shaped traveling cap, the long yellow gol-shes were not long from old England. The men had met by accident at a crossing of country roads, and being both bound for Glace City, in Virginia, they agreed to make the journey together. The conversation, anything but lively at any time, had ceased altogether. The New Yorker answered his companion's questions curtly, and lapsed into silence before they had traveled a mile together.

"GENTLEMEN, LET ME INTRODUCE YOU TO MY WINCHESTER."

"There is a house at last! It's as far as we can go to-day," suddenly exclaimed the American. "An old negro shanty, no doubt," pointing at a little ramshackle house, the roof of which peeped out of a cornfield. "Hardly decent enough to give shelter to a horse, but there's nothing else to be done!"

The two riders turned their horses into the narrow lane that led toward the house. When they were within 20 feet of it the door was suddenly thrown open and on the porch in front of it appeared the tall, gaunt form of an old man, with flowing beard and snow-white hair. His right hand clutched the stock of a Winchester rifle.

"Gentlemen," he cried—and there was a threat in his voice—"let me introduce you to my Winchester! The first who makes a motion toward his hip pocket will find himself with a hole in his ribs large enough to give passage to a yoke of oxen!"

The Englishman laughed heartily at this reception. "What queer people you Americans are!" he cried. "We've no desire to enter into an unfriendly argument with you!"

"Aha, you're a Britisher!"

"Yes, my good old friend, just over from old England."

"Your mate there looks like a tax collector in disguise."

The Englishman shrugged his shoulders, while the New Yorker introduced himself to the owner of the Winchester. "My name is George Deadmore," he said. "I'm a land agent from New York. Other people's business doesn't concern me in the least. I wouldn't know a moonshiner still if you held it under my very nose."

The old man made an angry motion and was about to send the intruders away, when Kentucky hospitality prevailed.

"Well, gentlemen, what can I do for you?"

"Show us the way to Glace City, that's all we want."

"Glace City is 50 miles from here. I wouldn't dare to travel over that deceptive path at the dead of night. You'll have to stay here till morning."

The guests dismounted and the hosts caught the reins of the horses and led them to the little shed in the rear of the house. There he unsaddled and fed them. When he came back he conducted his guests into the house, and invited them to a frugal meal, consisting of corn bread, bacon and a glass of whisky.

Next morning the Englishman awoke to find himself alone. His companion had departed before daylight.

"I didn't like to keep him," said the old man, "for I don't trust him; but I hope you will remain with me for awhile. My name is Walker, Col. Walker, and I haven't always lived in poverty. A beautiful country home stood on the site of this old tumble-down cabin, and hundreds of negroes worked in my fields. But the war swept away my house, my lands and my slaves, and weeds are growing where tobacco and cotton flourished. I was luckier than many, for I held onto the land, and I have good reason for living in this wilderness. That Yankee yesterday was not far out of the way. If it's unlawful what I am doing, the Yankees are to blame for it. They made me a beggar! But you, stay with me just a little while, you've no idea how lonely it is for an old man to be cut off from everybody."

The invitation was given so heartily that the young Englishman decided to accept it. He had come over to this country to study the land and its people, and here was a good chance to see a phase of life and a kind of people of whom he had read in books.

The days stretched into weeks, the weeks into months, and still the Englishman tarried. His days were spent in riding about the country, hunting, fishing and exploring the beauties of the Cumberland hills. On one of these exploring tours he came upon a little distillery built close to the edge of a mountain brook. It was here the old man brewed his "moonshine" whisky. The arrangements were primitive and quaint, but the Englishman never discussed his discovery with his old friend. At night he and his friend ate their frugal meal, smoked their pipes and reveled in the loveliness of the southern night. The old warrior told of the days before the war when the country teemed with prosperity, and the Englishman listened in sympathetic silence.

Suddenly their peaceful seclusion was rudely disturbed. While the stranger strolled through the forest on the hills a fusillade of rifle shots rent the air. They came from the direction of the little cabin. He hastened down and soon reached the clearing in front of the house. In his absence the old man had been surprised by tax collectors. Three of them lay dead in their blood at the edge of the corn field. Leaning against a tree stump the Englishman recognized his former traveling companion from New York. Col. Walker's rifle had done effective work. The riderless horses feasted on the tender ears of the corn in the fields. Nothing was to be seen of the old man.

The stranger, sick with fear over the terrible tragedy, stumbled into the cabin. There, ghastly white and with disheveled hair, lay his old friend. Blood trickled from several wounds, and formed little puddles along the floor. The blue jeans shirt rose and fell with the labored breathing of the dying man. He was unconscious. The Englishman knelt besides him, moistening his lips with drops of the burning liquid which was responsible for the tragedy. One bullet has grazed the left temple, another had shattered the elbow, and the third had penetrated the abdomen. The wound was deadly, there was no recovery from it. The wounded man regained consciousness and immediately recognized his young friend.

"These scoundrels have poured more lead into me than is good for my health. The New York chap gave me away. He sent the tax collectors after me. Well, he is dead, and I'll soon follow, but before I go I want to exact a promise from you. All my old friends are dead. They were either killed in the war or died soon afterwards, and I am sorely troubled about my little girl.'

"Your daughter?"

"Yes, my daughter. I have never spoken about her to any one. I sent her away to a convent in Paris. This rough, inhospitable life would not suit her at all. I intended to have her come home when the place was built up again. For her I stinted and saved and made 'moonshine' whisky. I never liked the business. It isn't fit for a gentleman. Now my daughter has finished her education and is coming here to see her old father again. She will not find me alive; but she will come into her own. There is $50,000 in the bank. And now, for the favor I'll ask of you. It's a dying man's request, will you fulfill it?"

"Yes, as far as is in my power."

"Then go to my daughter—and make her your wife."

The Englishman was dumfounded. He—to marry the daughter of a murderer. Had he forgotten that yonder in the grass lay three men whom he had killed?

"You are going to deny my request," cried the colonel. "I know what you are thinking. Have pity. In a few moments I'll be dead. Come, make haste. She is beautiful," he moaned, when the Englishman still hesitated. "Pure as the snow and highly accomplished. You need not be ashamed to call her your wife."

"Stop," cried the Englishman, torn with contending emotions. "Do not make my answer more difficult than it is. I am no longer free to give love. On my way over from Havre I gave my heart to a young girl. She gave me hers. I cannot break my word, for I love her passionately.

The dying man clutched the Englishman's sleeve. "Then take my orphan girl and let her live with you and your wife. Shield her from harm, and some day find a good husband for her."

"That I will with all my heart," promised the Englishman. "But tell me, where can I find her?"

"She does not bear her father's name. The stigma of the 'moonshine still' attaches to mine. She was called Josefa after her mother."

"And what was her other name?" questioned vehemently the young man.

"Turner—Josefa Turner."

"Josefa Turner, the girl who promised to be my wife. * * * your daughter!"

Like a drunken man he staggered toward a chair and threw himself upon it, burying his face in his hands.

The moments sped by and with them the life of the wounded man. When the young Englishman shook off the lethargy into which he had fallen he rose and went over to the spot where the old man lay.

He was dead, but over his rugged, wrinkled face lay the sweet light of peace.

New Economy.

A Tennessee community, apparently founded on institutes drawn from the precepts of Ruskin, has just established a college, to which they gave the name of that rhapsodist, at New-Economy, the town they have built up in the last three years. The community now numbers 213 and possesses property valued at $80,000. When it started each head of a family put in $500, and the increment represents what they have earned in the interval beyond their living expenses.

The settlement lives as a single family; its standard of value is an hour's labor; in its home commerce it has no money and needs none—a certificate that labor has been performed takes its place. A pound of tea costs eleven hours' work; seventy hours pay for a pair of shoes; two and a half for a pound of crackers, and so on. Everybody works and all—men and women alike—receive the same wages. They have heretofore worked ten hours a day, but expect soon to reduce it to eight. They have a kindergarten and adequate education machinery, music, languages and a limited technology being taught in addition to the regular branches.

The majority of the communists are agnostics. There is no church, but those who like can go to church outside. Of the great number of similar communities first and last founded in this country few survive. The most do not outlast a decade, and it would not be safe to predict a longer term for this one, though its institution of a college shows that it has so far no misgivings on that score.—New York Tribune.

A Racing Stable a Luxury.

A veteran turfman, in speaking of the expense of conducting a racing stable, gives some rather startling figures. One would want at least twelve horses, and these, if they are to be honest, fair racers, with some chance of success, would cost at least $75,000. This is a very low estimate, as is seen by the following figures. It cost August Belmont $92,500 for four horses—Henry of Navarre, $27,000; Hastings, $37,500; Keenan, $18,000; and Dorian, $10,000. In the same year W. P. Thompson paid $26,000 for Requital. After the purchase of the horses the next big item of expense will be a trainer, who will want at least $5,000 a year, besides his living, which will amount to fully $2,500. The trainer will also expect a percentage of winnings. No jockey worth the name can be secured for less that $7,500 per year, besides valuable presents and tips. In 1896 August Belmont paid Griffin a salary of $17,500. This year Fred Taral receives from Marcus Daly $18,000; while "Tod" Sloane, who is riding for Pittsburg Phil, gets $15,000. Fred Littlefield gets $10,000 from the Morrises, while Thorpe draws $8,000 for piloting the Bromley string.

India Rubber.

Caoutchouc is a milky juice, white as it flows from the plant, but darkening with exposure to the weather. It is commonly called India rubber, and is so useful and convenient an article that civilized people could hardly get along comfortably without it. It forms an important article of commerce. Mexico, Central and South America, and the East Indies are the principal places from which India rubber comes. The East India rubber is the juice of a species of fig tree. The South American product is taken from the syringe tree, which is sometimes as high as an eight-story house. To erase pencil marks is one of the uses of India rubber which will occur to you first, and then you will think of water-proof cloaks and shoes, without which you could not go out comfortably in stormy weather. But these only begin to be the list of articles which this obliging gum aids in constructing. Tubes, fire hose, elastic bands, mats, belts for machinery, door springs, etc., are made of it. Combined with sulphur it forms combs, canes, buttons, picture frames brush backs and surgical instruments and combined with sulphur and coal tar and polished like jet it is used to make beautiful ornamental jewelry.

OUR BIG WHEAT CROP.

HOW IT IS TRANSPORTED FOR EXPORT TO EUROPE.

Methods Employed on the Railroads, in the Elevators and at the Harbors—America May Export 200,000,000 Bushels During This Grain Year.

Handling a Wheat Crop.

The world's eye is upon the United States, looking for its wheat supply, and there is every indication that we will have wheat enough to sell to make us all feel rich and happy. Late in August and in September the heavy movement begins, and thereafter the grain goes to Europe in a constant stream, amounting in ordinary years to about 85,000,000 bushels, and it has run up to 132,859,336 bushels during this period. It would not surprise any of the more experienced wheat operators if the United States were called upon this year to supply the world something like 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. At 80 cents a bushel this would bring into the country $160,0000,000 in gold or its equivalent. Such enormous sums, however, are not earned without an enormous amount of labor. Part of this is that of the farmer, but another part, and one that forms a large share of the total cost to the consumer, is that of transportation.

The wheat fields of Europe fall so far short of feeding the people about them that hundreds of millions of bushels are drawn from sources thousands of miles distant. The three great wheat fields for this supply are our own, those of southern Russia, and the newly developed ones of the Argentine Republic. The total exports from these three countries last year were 270,000,000 bushels. In our great export years of 1892 and 1893 we had crops to draw upon of 685,000,000 bushels grown in 1891 and 580,000,000 bushels grown in 1892. Last year our crop was 470,000,000 bushels, and this year it is believed to amount to 575,000,000 bushels.

LOADING A GRAIN BARGE AT A CHICAGO ELEVATOR.

From the moment this crop leaves the hands of the farmers it is the subject of the operations of a set of clever men, whose calculations are made upon such an accurate basis that the manner in which it shall reach the seaboard and the ports from which it shall be shipped would be determined by a difference of 1-16 of a cent a bushel. As a result the method of gathering and forwarding the grain has been reduced to a science, and the cost has been brought to the lowest possible figure. Preparations for buying the grain are begun months before it is cut. Every buyer knows not only the exact acreage planted in the section of country where he operates, but also the entire acreage it would be possible to plant there. From week to week, as the crop matures, he gets telegraphic reports of its condition, and when it is ready to sell he is informed to the hour.

Formerly the operators were often hampered for cars in which to receive the grain, and this is so in some localities yet, but within a few years there have sprung up thousands of small elevators thickly dotting every feeder, as well as the main railroad lines in the grain regions. Some of these are mere roadside bins, where the farmer may drive up upon an incline and shovel his load out, but many of them have a capacity of 30,000 to 40,000 bushels and have an endless belt elevator, bins for different qualities of grain, and big hopper scales for weighing it. It is chiefly from these wayside storehouses that the grain finds its way into the enormous elevators at Chicago, Duluth, Superior, St. Paul, Buffalo and other railroad centers on the way to the seaboard, east or south.

The biggest elevators are those at Chicago and Buffalo, and the greatest of all grain routes is that over the great lakes to Buffalo. From Buffalo half a dozen trunk line railoads carry the crop to the sea. In adition to New York wheat is shipped from Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Newport News, Norfolk, New Orleans and Galveston. At each port are elevators in which the grain is received, graded, stored, and finally passed out to the ships which take it across the ocean.

Wheat is shipped in only one kind of car—the box car—for it must not be exposed to the weather. The standard size holds 1,000 bushels or 60,000 pounds. A few cars are made which hold 80,000 pounds. Regular grain cars have an inside door of light planking, which is hung on hinges that slide down rods set in the car, one on each side of the doorway. When this door is not in use it is raised to the ceiling, where it lies flat and is hooked fast. When the car is to be loaded it is run alongside a grain bin and a telescopic chute is lowered into one doorway. The grain doors are closed, a valve is opened and the grain pours into the car until it is two-thirds full, the regular load. The railroad contracts to bring the grain from Chicago and deliver it alongside a vessel anywhere in New York harbor for 20 cents a bushel. The car is run into the elevator structure there on the ground floor. A man with a crowbar pries up the grain door and the wheat comes rushing out and falls into a pit beside the car. There are iron gratings over the pit to keep out coarse objects and for the workmen to walk upon. Down at the bottom of the pit is the open end of an iron shaft, inside of which works an endless belt faced with steel cups set a foot apart. When the belt starts the grain is caught up in the cups and delivered in an almost unbroken stream at the top of the building, where the cups tip over as they start to return. In half an hour a car is unloaded and the last vestiges of grain are swept out and another car takes its place. All over the elevator floor are other cars unloading.

No wheat is loaded directly from the elevators into ships at harbor, but goes to them in barges. Beside the elevator lie tiers of vessels, built like canal boats. From the scales the grain comes pouring down 100 feet or more through chutes which end with steel telescopic pipes a foot in diameter. There are two or three of the chutes, and two pipes to a chute, and the pipes are pouring the grain into the hold of the barge at every hatchway. If a man were to hold his arm under one of those streams of grain it would be cut off as with a saw. In each hatchway of the barges is a man with his mouth and nose protected by muslin to keep the dust out. He is armed with a big wooden butter bowl, mounted on a handle. You think at first that he is going to shovel the wheat with this, but he knows a better trick. He places the butter bowl under the stream of wheat, and this stream, turned by the smooth rounded inside of the bowl, shoots off to one side just as a stream of water would, and the trimmer, by turning the bowl from time to time, sends the wheat wherever he wants it. A barge holds about 8,000 bushels. In an hour or less this is loaded, and then a tug takes her off to the ship.

A floating elevator lies alongside the latter. The barge ties up beside the floating elevator, a leg of an endless belt is thrust down into her hatchway and a dozen men shovel the grain up to the elevator to keep it supplied. In about an hour and a half the barge is emptied. The elevator does not deliver the wheat direct to the ship. Midway is another set of weighing hoppers, and it passes through these and is weighed before a second elevator carries it to a chute which sends it into the ship's hold. If there is a discrepancy between the railroad weights, and the floating elevator weights, the railroad pays in cash for what is short or collects in cash for what is over. A loss of more than two bushels to a thousand would, however, require an explanation.

Woman and the Camera.

Miss Frances Benjamin Johnston, the photographic artist, writes, in the Ladies' Home Journal, on "What a Woman Can Do With a Camera," telling the requisites for artistic and financial success in the pusuits of photography as a profession. "It is a profession," she strongly contends, "that should appeal particularly to women, and in it there are great opportunities for a good-paying business—but only under very well-defined conditions. The prime requisites—as summed up in my mind after long experience and thought—are these: The woman who makes photography profitable must have, as to personal qualities, good common sense, unlimited patience to carry her through endless failures, equally unlimited tact, good taste, a quick eye, a talent for detail, and a genius for hard work. In addition, she needs training, experience, some capital, and a field to exploit. This may seem, at first glance, an appalling list, but it is incomplete rather than exaggerated; although to an energetic, ambitious woman, with even ordinary opportunities, success is always possible, and hard, intelligent and conscientious work seldom fails to develop small beginnings into large results.

"Good work should command good prices, and the wise woman will place a paying value upon her best efforts. It is a mistaken business policy to try and build up trade by doing something badly cheaper than somebody else. As to your personal attitude, be business-like in all your methods; cultivate tact, an affable manner, and an unfailing courtesy. It costs nothing but a little self-control and determination to be patient and good-natured under most circumstances. A pleasant, obliging and business-like bearing will often prove the most important part of a clever woman's capital."

Speed in Walking.

"There's no end of persons," said a man who walks a great deal himself, "who think they could walk four miles an hour, and very likely they could, but they would have to move along very briskly to do it. As a matter of fact, very few indeed do walk four miles an hour; three miles is a very fair galt, and when one exceeds that he is beginning to walk fast. If my recollection serves the old common time in the army carried a man two and five-eighths miles an hour. The distances which the soldier covers in an hour have now increased somewhat by slightly increasing the length of his steps, but my impression is that the common time remains under three miles an hour. Certainly three miles would be good, fair walking, and fully up to man's average speed."—New York Evening Sun.

Redeeming Mutilated Money.

According to the present rule of the redemption division of the United States Treasury nothing less than fragments representing two-fifths of a bank note or greenback will be redeemed by Uncle Sam. "If that much of a note is presented the United States," writes Clifford Howard, on "Destroying a Million Dollars a Day," in the Ladies' Home Journal, "will allow the holder one-half the face value of it, while three-fifths of a note will be redeemed for full value. Of course, there are occasional exceptions to this rule.

"Some time since a man from New England forwarded a bunch of discolored paper money that he had found buried in a field. It had laid in the ground so long a time, and had been so generously feasted upon by worms, that it fell to pieces as soon as it was touched. It would have been utterly impossible for any one unacquainted with the secret marks that the government places on its bills to gather these decayed pieces of money together in their proper order; but some of the clerks in the redemption division of the treasury are particularly expert in sorting and deciphering bits of mutilated money, and through long years of experience are able to tell in an instant to what particular note or kind of note a certain scrap belongs. When the pieces contained in this bunch of old money were finally sorted and mounted it was found that while there was not one complete note remaining (not more than two or three scraps in some instances) the rightful owner was entitled to a redemption of four hundred dollars. Unfortunately for the man who found the money, he could not prove his ownership, nor could he make affidavit as to what had become of the missing portions of the notes. Consequently, the United States was the gainer in this case. Accidents of this nature are by no means rare, as is attested by the number of boxes of charred remnants of money which are kept among the curious records of the redemption division."

Canada's Unexplored Territory.

The unexplored area of Canada is estimated at 1,000,000 square miles. A quarter of this will be explored next year in the search for gold.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

San Francisco merchants are trying hard to capture the Alaskan trade from Seattle.

A one-inch cube of gold is worth $210; a cubic foot $362,380, and a cubic yard is valued at $9,797,762.

Virginia City is putting on metropolitan airs. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is to be presented there this week.

Sentiment is at a discount in practical politics. In New York, Henry George, Jr., as the son of his father, received but a trifle over 20,000 votes.

San Francisco mining men propose to shortly announce their plans for the celebration of the semi-centennial anniversary of the discovery of gold in California on January 24 next.

A few days ago a careless fellow found a $400 nugget near Brown's Flat, Tuolumne county. If it had been found in Klondike the Examiner woud have had a full page about it.—Bodie Miner-Index.

The Alaska gold fields are said to be 900 miles long and 200 miles wide. Aside from its mineral deposits the territory produces an immense crop of free milling liars that show as high as forty colors to the pan.

Glen Head, N. Y., has a woman veterinary surgeon. The fair sex is now represented in nearly all trades and professions, but the positions of housekeeping and tending the baby are still open for pre-emption.

The San Francisco Post makes a sly dig at a couple of well-known Americans thusly: "Mark Twain has of late years struggled along under an enormous load of debt, but his admirers have cause for congratulation in the fact that he has not yet sought to increase his income by reporting a prize fight or burglarizing a jail."

A glance over any of the coast papers cannot fail to impress one that gold mining is experiencing a boom. Not since the times previous to '55 has public attention been so much directed toward the mineral resources of California. The estimated output of gold for 1897 is $20,000,000, and it is claimed that the yield of '98 will approach $30,000,000.00.

Henry George's Life and Work.

Henry George was born in Philadelphia September 2, 1839. He was educated in the Philadelphia public schools and was a classmate of the Rev. R. Heber Newton, the Episcopal clergyman. He began to earn his living as an office boy and spent two years in a commercial house in his native city. Then he went to the composing case in a printing establishment, following the printers' trade until he was 20 years old, with the exception of one year, when, at the age of 16, he shipped as a cabin boy on board an old East India merchantman, in which he visited various parts of the world, including Australia. At the age of 20 he started for California.

He first worked as a reporter in Sacramento, and in that city in 1861 he married Annie C. Fox, a lady of Australian parentage who lived in Amador county. She and three children survive him. After several years he retired from newspaper work, and took charge of a Western press agency in New York in opposition to the regular Associated Press. In 1871, in connection with two friends, he started the San Francisco Evening Post.

Originally a Republican, Mr. George joined the Democratic party in 1872 and represented California in the National Democratic Convention which nominated Greeley for President. He stumped California for Tilden in 1876. He severed his connection with the Post in 1875. He early became interested in the land question, issuing a pamphlet as far back as 1869 upon the subject, and publishing a series of letters on it later in a New York paper.

In 1877 he began to write "Progress and Poverty," the book which has given him a world-wide reputation. He finished it in August 1879. In it he developed his idea of a single tax on land, to take the place of all other forms of taxation. The book had a wide sale throughout this country, and has been translated into several languages.

In 1880 Mr. George left California and reached New York, which has ever since been his home. By that time about a thousand copies of "Progress and Poverty" had been sold. In 1881-83 he wrote letters from Ireland and England to the Irish World, delivering addresses in the principal cities and towns. In 1881 an English edition of "Progress and Poverty" was issued. A six-penny edition followed and had an extraordinary sale, whereupon the London Times came out with a page review, saying that the book of the California economist, hitherto unnoticed by the English press, could no longer be ignored. The supplies of the booksellers were exhausted in a single day, and the entire world soon became acquainted with "Progress and Poverty."

Mr. George continued to write in advocacy of his land theory. Late in 1883 he received an invitation from the Land Reform Union of England again to visit that country. He was received at a great meeting in St. James' Hall, Henry Labouchere presiding. "Then," relates Mr. George, "I spoke in the principal towns in England, and had large audiences, always hostile at first, but I conquered them all easily, with the exception of that of Oxford, the seat of learning, where I sat on the stage and could nor hear myself think. The Oxford students were determined to disturb the meeting, although Max Muller was my host and presided."

"In 1884 "Protection or Free Trade" was written and the manuscript lost. Then it had to be written all over again. In the same year, at the invitation of the Scottish Land Restoration League, Mr. George made his third trip abroad, addressing great audiences throughout Scotland.

After the election of 1886, when he made his run for Mayor of New York, Mr. George started his single-tax paper, the Standard. Two visits to England, in 1888 and in 1889, followed, and in 1890 he made a tour of Australia by way of San Francisco, where he received a warm welcome. He made over a hundred addresses in Australia. His progress was a continued ovation, the streets being frequently blockaded. Sir George Gray of New Zealand wished him to repeat his speeches in that colony, but Mr. George longed for home and returned by way of the Suez canal, getting a remarkably cordial reception in New York.

"Progress and Poverty" has been translated into French, German, Spanish, Italian, Dutch, Swedish, Russian, Japanese and Chinese. Mr. George's other books are "The Land Question," "Protection or Free Trade," "The Condition of Labor," "An Open Letter to Pope Leo XIII," "A Perplexed Philosopher," being an examination of Herbert Spencer's various utterances on the land question, with some incidental reference to his synthetic philosophy. "Property in Land," a passage at arms between the Duke of Argyll and Henry George.

The acceptance of the nomination for Mayor interrupted Mr. George in what he believed his greatest and most exhaustive work, "The Science of Political Economy."

A Cheap Cyanide Plant.

A writer in the New Zealand Mining Standard gives the following account of a cheap cyanide plant from which satisfactory results were obtained. It may contain some hints to those who wish to apply the cyanide process in inaccessible localities or have a small accumulation of tailings that do not warrant the erection of an expensive plant. It should not be forgotten, however, that much of the disaster attending the introduction of the cyanide process in the United States was due to the assertions of its promoters that all that was required for its application were a few old tubs and barrels, and it is probably only under exceptionally favorable conditions, as there were very likely at this New Zealand plant, that success would be expected reasonably with any such equipment.

The lots of tailings to be leached were from an arrastra, and extremely slimy, fully two-thirds being clean slimes. As any heavy pressure would pack such material, the vats were built very shallow, being 2 feet deep and 12 feet square. The first solution was added slowly from the bottom, and, care having been used in putting the material into the vat lightly, without tamping, but little tendency to settle was found as long as the surface of the solution or washwater did not fall below the level of the top of the tailings in the vat.

The small amount of material in sight would not justify the purchase of expensive tanks, especially since an exceptionally large amount of leaching surface was required, owing both to the shallowness of the leaching and its extreme slowness in this slimy material. A cheaper method of building vats had, therefore, to be found, and after a few experiments, the following was adopted: A row of seven boxes, 2 feet deep and 12 feet square, braced from the outside every 4 feet, was built, surfaced with lumber, 1½ inch stuff being used throughout, but no extra precaution being taken in the construction beyond thorough nailing. Over the cracks strips of canvass 3 inches wide were laid on top of a streak of hot (but not boiled) asphalt. A sheet of canvass of medium weight, 16 feet square, sewed with double seams, was then laid down in the vat and folded up in the corners, the side next to the board being covered with a good layer of hot asphalt just as it was laid, causing it to stick fast to the wood throughout. The upper edges were tacked to the vat—no other tacks being put through the canvas. The inside of the canvas then thoroughly asphalted, with special care about the corners. The vat floor inclined 1½ inches in 12 feet, both east and north. In the northeast corner, 1 foot from the sides, the floor had been cut ¾ inch deep in a saucer-shaped depression, and a hole for a 1¼ inch pipe bored. This was put in through a hole in the canvas and bolted tight in hot asphalt with 3-inch washers on the canvas and on the plank below.

Filters were of double burlap on 1-inch square strips, 1 inch apart, laid diagonally on the canvas bottom to within 6 inches of the sides—these held in place by canvas strips tacked across. Four strips, 1x4x11 feet 6 inches, cut at 45 deg. angle on corners, were laid around the bottom of the vat, a small roll of burlap being tacked to the thin under side, which stuck to the still warm asphalt. To these strips were fastened the burlap filter.

The outlet pipe was bent at right angles 3 inches below the vat. A short piece of hose was wired on it, and into the end of the hose was pushed a wooden spigot, which drained directly into a 2x4 inch launder running alongside the vats to the zinc-house. This launder was lined with a strip of asphalted canvas, and covered tightly except at the spigots. The same method of preventing leakage by means of asphalt and canvas was used in the construction of zinc boxes and solution tanks, the latter being built on the same general plan as the vats.

The pumping from the sump tank to the old solution tank was done by a small Pelton motor, so set that the waste water from it could be used in leaching. Solutions were carried to the vats from the tanks by means of rubber hose.

With proper care, however, in the use of well-seasoned timber, and good grade of asphalt, these vats lasted very well. A leak is easily mended by a new coat of asphalt, and this should be applied every four or six week as a precautionary measure. The tanks and vats have given excellent service, and are now being used to leach tailings from a five-stamp mill since built on the ground.

E. F. Rich of Watsonville has just returned from a prospecting trip to Pleasant canyon, above Ballarat, where he has found a ledge twenty-two feet wide, the ore in it which he says will go about $48 to the ton. It carries considerable copper. Another ledge from twelve to fourteen feet in width carries about $100 to the ton, a narrow seam from ten inches to a foot in width containing free gold in liberal quantities. The ledges are situated in the Argus range in Inyo county, about 110 miles distant from the railroad, and they lie between slate and porphyry formations.—Chronicle.

NEWSY NOTES FROM BIG PINE.

BIG PINE, Nov. 9, 1897.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—Still the hamlet continues to grow. Since my last, Mr. Henry Bell has commenced constructing a fine house near the M. E. Church. I don't want any compensation for calling attention to the secular advantage of building "gospel shops" in country villages, yet this is pent with a sigh for the times when the faithful only thought of the necessity for their construction as orthodox places of worship. The indications are now in evidence that the thankfulness of our part of the country on the next National "gratitude" day will be fully up to the established standard of the hamlet. The campus to the north of the town has been cleared of all dried summer growth and properly levelled for baseball and other field sports. The local experts of the national game met last night and organized. Indications are ripe that the bronze boys of Piute lineage will acquit themselves nobly at the tournament. It has been suggested by the "shootists" of this "neck of the woods" that a little target contest be held—something in the nature of an old-time turkey match, and all accurate pellet directors are invited to come armed and equipped as suggested by the aforesaid suggestion.

Since the founding of the hamlet a favorite method of expression for proper sentiments has been the graceful ordinance of dancing, therefore the final emphasis of thankfulness will be done on the eve of the 26th day of the eleventh month, late in the 19th century, by celebrating an old-time dance at Williams hall, and all and everybody who thus believeth, let them come up to the hamlet and rejoice for the muchness of the harvest of the year. That all cussedness, petty spites an sich may be exorcised for the occasion and a good time be had is the earnest prayer of SWAMPER.

A Smelter.

Word comes from a reliable source from Los Angeles that a smelter is at last an assured fact and the same will soon be built at the station called Minneola situated about 10 miles east of Barstow. Mr. Lang, a practical smelter and mining man from Colorado, is the chief factor in the enterprise. The incorporation will be known, however, as the Mojave Smelter Company. Several Los Angeles parties, including railroad officials, have an interest in the company. The Southern California Improvement Company (which is another name for the land department of the Southern California Railroad) have lent their aid to the enterprise, and the Minneola Town, Land & Water Company have granted them all the land needed. The Santa Fe Pacific have granted concessions in the wav of freight rates and have guaranteed the smelter that the rates anywhere from the Needles to Mojave will not exceed $1 50 per ton. It is the intention of the railroad and smelter to so work in harmony that ore worth $4 per ton can be minee and milled on the wholesale basis at a profit.—Randsburg Miner.

It is claimed that the rescuer of Evangelina Cisneros was none other than William Hearst, proprietor of the San Francisco Examiner. Now Pulitzer is said to be packing his "Gladstone" for Working, England, where he will defy the British authorities, rescue Mrs. Maybrick, and bring her to New York as a permanent exhibit in the World building. The days of romance and chivalry are not past; the yellow kids need them in their business.—Virginia Chronicle.

The Republic Mining Company has been incorporated at Los Angeles, with a capital stock of $40,000 and $30,000 of it has been subscribed. The directors are all ladies but one.

An exchange remarks: "One reason so many of our young men remain single is that they spend so much money on their girls they havent money enough left to buy a license with."

Horse Breeding in the West.

The study which Secretary Wilson made of the condition and requirements of the agricultural communities visited during his late extended trip through the West, will prove of much importance to the interests involved. He is now arranging the data collected for the purpose of suggesting reforms that promise to bring fruitful results. During the tour of the Mountain States he gave special attention to the horse stock on the ranges, and his observations, which are worth of the attention of all breeders, can best be presented in his own words:

"The conditions which exist in the corn and grass belt of the country where horses are raised," said the Secretary to a Breeders' Gazette reporter, "are found in an intensified form in the mountain states. Not much hay is made in the latter section, and the little that is saved for feeding weak cows and young cattle through the winter and through storms. The horse consequently suffers in the winter and is not developed. He reaches maturity a stunted animal, weighing from 700 to 1000 pounds, the weight depending somewhat upon the ranch conditions where he is found and the blood that is in him. The intelligent ranchmen understand this. They would like to grow more alfalfa and oats to feed the colts during the winter months, but the water supply is deficient, and they have not the capital to build dams in the river and lead the water out through aqueducts and ditches onto the higher benches that are now irrigated. Many of the mountain streams are used to the fullest extent. Even the great Salt Lake valley has not water enough to wet it. This is the reason that the ranch horse is almost worthless property. I advised the ranchmen to send to the nearest corn-growing states for cheap corn. A few dollars' worth will keep the colt growing through the winter, and if the winter feeding is continued will be found that at four years old the horse will weigh from 300 to 400 pounds more than he would under the present conditions. The same kind of management makes a small horse in the Mississippi Valley States. There is an old-fashioned idea that the horse that is wanted in the United States is a tough horse, and one that will go long distances, entirely irrespective of the question whether the people outside the United States want such horses. Agents of foreign governments have not only been through the corn-growing States of America, but have been through the ranch States, and have picked up a few horses fit for army purposes and have taken them to Europe. But they cannot find as many as they want. The ranchmen offer a good excuse for not feeding their horses in the winter. They have no feed to give them. There is no such excuse, however, for the farmers of Illinois, Iowa and other corn-growing States. One of the greatest handicaps to progress in stock raising, as in numerous other enterprises, is the notion that we know what the world ought to have. Our farmers and stockmen produce horses which in a way answer their own purposes, and then say that if they are good enough for them they are good enough for anybody, and if the world does not choose to buy them they can go without. Our pastures and barns in the corn growing states are full of stunted horses. Too much trotting blood has been used by many of our farmers. Size cannot be had from that blood. The trotting-horse men have without doubt given us many valuable lessons. They have shown us where the climate, soil water and other conditions essential to successful horse-growing are to be found—where first-class horses can be produced.

"The western farmer who has corn does not feed it. He treats his young growing stock pretty much as the ranchman is compelled to treat his. He turns them into the stalkfield and around the stacks and lets them rustle through the winter while he has plenty of corn but will not feed it. It will do very little good to improve the blood unless we follow improved blood with better feeding. There is no question whatever that the people of the United States can produce a horse cheaper than he can be produced anywhere else—that is a serviceable horse weighing 1,200 lbs. and upward.

"The European armies require a horse weighing about 1100 or 1200 pounds. For carriage purposes a horse weighing from 1200 to 1400 is required, while draft horses should weigh from 1600 pounds upward. All these horses can be produced cheaper in the United States than anywhere else, because we have cheaper grains, grasses and foliage. To illustrate this point, we may call attention to the foreign beef market. We are driving the European feeder to the wall because we have cheaper feed here. We can do the same thing with regard to horses. Our beef men have met the requirements of foreign markets by breeding and feeding to a finish; our horsemen must follow their example if we are to create a foreign demand for our horses, or supply a demand that now exists."

The three-year-old boy of J. A. Johnson of Lynn Center, Ill., is subject to attacks of croup. Mr. Johnson says he is satisfied that the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, during a severe attack, saved his little boy's life. He is in the drug business, a member of the firm of Johnson Bros. of that place; and they handle a great many patent medicines for throat and lung diseases. He had all these to chose from, and skilled physicians ready to respond to his call, but selected this remedy for use in his own family at a time when his child's life was in danger, because he knew it to be superior to any other, and famous the country over for its cures of croup. Mr. Johnson says this is the best selling cough medicine they handle, and that it gives splendid satisfaction in all cases. Sold by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

THAT TERRIBLE SCOURGE.

Malarial disease is invariably supplemented by disturbance of the liver, the bowels, the stomach and the nerves. To the removal of both the cause and its effects Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is fully adequate. It "fills the bill" as no other remedy does, performing its work thoroughly. Its ingredients are pure and wholesome, and it admirably serves to build up a system broken by ill health and shorn of strength. Constipation, liver and kidney complaint and nervousness are conquered by it.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

A FAST COLT.

Cyclone Was the Youngster's Name and He Richly Deserved It.

Several men gathered about a horse near the western market commenting upon the prominence of the beast's ribs and general lankiness. The animal belonged to a farmer living near Ypsilanti, and, it was said, never permitted grass to grow under its feet on the road. The farmer was not pleased with the remarks and the strong inferences that the poor thing had never realized the sensation of corn and oats.

"What do you call your horse?" was asked.

"Cyclone, and don't he look it?" replied the man from the rural districts.

"Cyclone! What a name! He certainly looks as if one had struck him."

"That's what happened to him, my friend. It was just like this. You remember the awful breeze we had out to Ypsilanti about three years ago? This feller was a sucking colt at the time and was in the barn with two horses. The cyclone, regular old hummer, came along and thrashed the barn off its legs and dropped it nigh on to 100 yards away. After the twister had raised all the hob, fences and sheds it could we went out to look things up. The two horses were stone dead and the colt—would you believe it?—was nowhere to be found.

"Next day I turned over the hen-coop, which lay in the field half a mile away. Right in that coop and laying on the door which faced down was the colt. He commenced kicking when he heard us, and we took him out in a hurry. He wasn't scared a bit, I tell you, and was cool as a cucumber. The neighbors say they saw the coop goin through the air and the colt after it. The little feller caught the coop and got inside of it to save himself, that's what he did. That's the plain truth, and if you don't believe it ask the colt. Good day, strangers."—Detroit Free Press.

ENGLISH IN CHICAGO.

Discussion on Grammar Between a Newspaper and a Citizen.

The Chicago Inter Ocean becomes both sarcastic and indignant when any one questions the purity of its diction. So when a reader named Campbell ventured to criticise expressions used by its society editor the captious one found that he had caught a Tartar. This is the way The Inter Ocean puts it:

Inclosed with the following letter, received a few days ago, were two clippings from the society columns of The Inter Ocean:

Here are three barbarisms that caught my eye in this morning's issue of your paper—There is no such word as "gowned"—it is merely a Cockney vulgarism that had its origin in London, England—"Swellest" is of the same sort—and same origin—No American having any regard for purity of language can use such slang—As all these words appear in so called "society items" I take it your Society editor is a male or female dude and needs a lesson in language—The harm done by the use of such words in your paper is very great as thousands of children read it and absorb its words—Do stop this Cockney vulgarity—

JAMES CAMPBELL.

There is no doubt you mean well, Jim, but a term in a night school would be beneficial even to you before you begin to give lessons in English. To begin with, you would be taught there that our grandfather, Lindley Murray, always told us to use periods. You ought to have known Lindley, Jim. He was a distinguished grammarian, you know, or perhaps you don't know.

And then, Jim, there was Tennyson. He said of a heroine in one of his poems that she was "gowned in pure white." So you see Lord Tennyson found the word "gowned" to be useful long before you learned to walk steady on your hind feet or to eat with your front hoofs. Webster says "gowned" means "dressed in a gown; clad."

You say that these barbarians "caught your eye," and you fail to mention which eye they caught. How is the other eye?

You are right when you say that our society editor is either a male or a female. Do you belong to one of these sexes? We suspect not. When you write again, spell "merely" as it should be. The way you spelled it is like spelling your name "camel" instead of "Campbell." See that hump?

We don't like to offend your sensitive ear, or the other one either, Jim. Buy Webster's Dictionary and a fourth reader. Start right, and your sensitive ear may outgrow its affliction.

They Played Poker.

In the summer of 1840 Henry Clay went to Kentucky on his vacation. Three nights after his arrival at a certain springs a sociable game began. In the game were Mr. Clay, Josiah Blackburn, John Hardin and Sam Clay, a cousin of the statesman. It began on Friday night and ran along with varying luck. They were all old hands and had the nerve to back their cards. At 12 o'clock Saturday night Blackburn quit a little ahead. He had been married only two months and was afraid his young wife would think he was dead. Sunday morning at 9 o'clock some one rapped on the door. It was opened, and a negro girl stood in the hall. She had a clean shirt in her hand, and on the bosom was a note from Hardin's wife, "For Mr. John Hardin, wherever he can be found." The door was closed and play resumed. Hardin changed his linen at the table.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Perverted Judgment.

The cause of a wrong taste is a defect of judgment. And this may arise from a natural weakness of understanding (in whatever the strength of that faculty may consist), or, which is much more commonly the case, it may arise from a want of a proper and well directed exercise, which alone can make it strong and ready. Besides, that ignorance, inattention, prejudice, rashness, levity, obstinacy—in short, all those passions and all those vices which pervert the judgment in other matters, prejudice it no less in this its more refined and elegant province.—Burke.

VOWED NOT TO SPEAK,

And at the End of Fifty Years When She Tried She Could Not.

There is possibly no other woman in the world like Miss Experience Guilford, of Bluehill, Me. It is proverbial that a woman's tongue never steps, but Miss Guilford's case is an exception to this rule, and for half a century she has held her peace. Not one single word or audible sound has this woman allowed to pass her lips for a period of fifty years.

The original reason for Miss Guilford's speechlessness was anger because she could not marry the man of her choice. When she was 19 years old she fell in love with William Simpson, the village schoolmaster. They were to be married on June 18, 1847. One of Miss Guilford's rejected suitors told tales about the schoolmaster, and Miss Guilford's parents stopped the wedding. Miss Guilford thereupon said:

"I swear I will not speak a word, though I live for fifty years, unless I marry this man."

She kept her pledge. Her parents died, and she went to live with her married brother. When he died she made her home with a sister, and after the sister's death she went to a camp in the woods, and kept house for a brother, with whom she is now living.

All this time she performed her share of the household work, and did not show any regret for having made the vow. When the fifty years of silence expired she was visited by a large number of relatives and friends, who went to the camp for the purpose of being present when she was at liberty to speak. Soon after the midday meal Miss Guilford dressed herself in the garments she had not worn for half a century. At 2 o'clock she stood before the people, smiled and opened her mouth to speak; but though she tried hard, and got red in the face in trying, she could not utter a sound. Her vocal muscles had become atrophied from long disuse and refused to work.

When Miss Guilford found she could not speak she sent to Bangor for a physician and took to her bed. The doctor gave no hope of recovery, but suggested that she be sent to a Boston hospital for treatment. As soon as Miss Guilford gets strong enough to take the journey she will make another effort to regain her speech. Her father left her a good sum of money at his death, which has been growing every year in a savings bank, so that she is well able to obtain the treatment she requires.

The Horseless Carriage.

Next to the bicycle, the horseless carriage will, for short rides, be the mechanical conveyance of the greatest blessing to humanity, and the interest of the public in this vehicle will be so great that inventors and manufacturers will redouble their energies to make a conveyance that will fill this demand.

The horseless carriage which is to be the conveyance of the future must be sold at a more reduced price than the horseless carriage of to-day costs. When this time comes the advantages of such a mode of conveyance will be so many that the problem of traversing short distances will be satisfactorily solved. Inasmuch as one of the greatest manufacturing firms of the highest grade of bicycles the world over has recently reduced the price of its wheels very materially, we look with encouragement to this firm to be the one to produce the best horseless carriage and the lowest one in price, considering the material used and the skilled workmanship employed.

When the horseless carriage comes down in price it will become a necessity. At present a horse must be kept for bad weather by people who are unable, through weakness or poor health, to go about.

There are upward of 2,000 horseless carriages in use in Paris for public service, and private citizens can muster more than this number. Indeed, Europeans are much more familiar with them than Americans are. The horseless carriage is in very common use in Europe, although it is cumbersome and unwieldy. The general opinion is that since American genius has taken up the matter the horseless carriage will become a great success.

The horseless carriage has more advantages than appears at first sight. Of course there must be a place to keep it. The horse, the feed, the clearing up, the constant breakage of harness and the perpetual annoyance of feeling that one's animals are not half cared for, will give place to the ease and comfort with which the horseless carriage can be kept. It will not be difficult to learn to manage these carriages, and when repair shops become frequent, the problem of getting about will be so simplified that everybody will wonder why we never had such a convenient vehicle before.

An expert in mechanics is the authority for the assertion that the horseless carriage will run a much more successful and rapid career, everything considered than the bicycle.—New York Ledger.

The Alaskan Dog.

The Alaskan dog is almost human in intelligence. He weighs about 100 pounds. Heavily laden, he will travel as many as sixty miles a day.

With twenty dogs in a team no two of them are in a straight line from the driver. When unhitched for the night they pile upon the first blanket that is thrown upon the snow, and there they stay. When you crawl into your sleeping bag and pull a robe over it the dog will get under the robe. Unless you are careful he will be inside of the bag in the morning. Their endurance is phenomenal and they are capable of strong affection. They are great fighters.

A traveler who recently returned from Alaska says of the treatment accorded these faithful animals:

"The whip that is used on them is the cruelest thing of its kind that is known to man. Thirty feet in length and two inches thick near the short handle, it has a lash ten feet long that cuts like a knife. The Russian knout isn't in it. When a dog is struck you hear a sharp yelp, and then your sleigh whirls past a bit of fur or possibly a piece of bloody skin lying on the snow."

Taking Its Own Portrait.

It seems like something of an achievement to make a wild deer take its own portrait, but such a feat was lately accomplished by Mr. Charles Hughes, of Red Bluff, Cal.

He conceived the idea of causing a wild animal to take a flashlight photograph as it passed along a trail in the Coast Range of mountains, secure under cover of night.

To accomplish this purpose Mr. Hughes set up the camera a short distance from a trail over which deer were known to run, and then connected the shutter and the flashlight materials with a trap. When the deer stepped upon the trap the camera was opened and the flashlight set off at the same instant. Mr. Hughes thus secured the negative in the dead of night, and when there was not a soul within sight or hearing of the animal.

On developing the negative Mr. Hughes found the photograph of a deer. The frightened appearance of the animal as he was startled by the sudden flash of light is clearly shown in the picture.

Spots on the Sun.

"The sun has great activity in spots," says Bayne's "Pith of Astronomy," "these being sometimes 50,000 miles in diameter. These spots are enormous vents for the tempests of flame that sweep out of and down into the sun. An up-and-down rush has a velocity of about twenty miles a second, and a side rush a velocity of one hundred and twenty miles a second. These tempests rage for days and months at a time, and as they cease the sides of the spots fly together at the rate of 20,000 miles an hour. They strike together and the rising spray of fire leaps thousands of miles into space. It falls again and rolls over the Himalayas of fire as the sea over the pebbles on its beach. If strips as large as this earth were placed in such a tempest they would be mere corks as tossed by an ocean storm."

Key West Has No Chimneys.

It is curious, though true, that of all the houses, dwellings, stores, hotels and other buildings that dot the island of Key West from one shore to the other, not one of them has a chimney or anything that will answer the purpose of a chimney. Handsome residences and lowly hovels are alike in this respect, and from an eminence gazing out over acres of roofs on all sides one is struck with the want of something to complete the symmetry of the picture. Wood and coal or fuel of any kind are unknown quantities, as the tropical atmosphere furnishes all the heat required, and for cooking purposes sticks of carbon are used, which are sold by peddlers, who hawk their wares about the streets.—Atlanta Constitution.

Clothes of Paper.

Paper underclothing has a strange sound, but it is asserted that the Japanese have for a long time been making such garments from their finely crisped or grained paper, after the sheets have been pasted together at the edges so as to form large pieces. When the paper has been cut to pattern, the different parts are sewn together and hemmed, and the places where the buttonholes are to be formed are strengthened with calico and linen. The stuff is said to be very strong, and at the same time very flexible.

An Automatic Ticket Seller.

An automatic appliance for the delivery of railway tickets, which bids fair to hold a respectable place among similar devices, has been tried abroad. The machine works with absolute correctness, and dates as well as issues the tickets. It is particularly useful where a number of tickets have to be issued at fixed fares, such as for local passenger traffic.

Condiments and Digestion.

The introduction of mustard or pepper into the stomach of a rabbit caused the secretion of pancreatic juice to be tripled and even quadrupled. This accounts for the stimulating effects of these condiments upon digestion.

"I'll never ask another woman to marry me as long as I live!" "Refused again?" "No, accepted."

Life.—Life is a succession of choices, and our eternal destiny depends on the use we make of them.—Rev. H. S. Noon, Methodist, Philadelphia, Pa.

Success.—If one but opens up his heart to the incoming of Christ he may have some possibility of success and quick returns.—Rev. W. B. Packard, Congregationalist, Cleveland, Ohio.

Woman.—Women should stand by women, instead of trampling upon them. They should demand the same purity of man that man demands of woman.—Rev. B. de Costa, Episcopalian, New York City.

Politics.—I am in favor of more politics and more politicians if we can govern ourselves, and if we will make the business of government our business.—Rabbi M. J. Gries, Hebrew, Cleveland, Ohio.

The Sabbath.—It is the duty of the Christian Church all over the world to use its greatest efforts in furthering a better observance of the Sabbath day.—Rev. J. Van Nass, Presbyterian, Washington, D. C.

The Curse of the Age.—The great curse of the age is the everlasting reaching out after something for nothing, which is true in the mercantile world, the political world, and the Christian world.—Rev. H. N. Couden, Methodist, Washington, D. C.

A Workingman's Church.—The church must keep the social, physical and material wants of the workingman, as well as the spiritual. I plead for a million dollar palace of religion in the interest of the toiling masses.—Rev. G. W. Mead, Presbyterian, New York City.

Youth.—The world in all its departments is mainly what young men have made it. Manhood and age have often taught, but it is youth that makes the disciple and spreads the doctrine.—Rev. W. C. Webb, Methodist, Philadelphia, Pa.

Do Unto Others.—We expect our friends to slave and crawl and grind and drudge for us, and we do nothing for them. The best way to keep your friends true to you is for you to be true to them.—Rev. Frank DeW. Talmage, Presbyterian, Pittsburg, Pa.

Philanthropy.—We need wealth to endow our colleges, build our churches and carry on our foreign and domestic mission work; but if the giving of it is to stifle free expression of thought on economic and industrial questions, then better a thousand times that it be withheld.—Rev. W. H. Carwardine, Methodist, Chicago, Ill.

Political Bosses.—Political bossism is crime; it is selfishness flowered out into tyranny; ecclesiastical despotism is blasphemy; it is an attempt to subordinate consciences to the empire of one conscience; it is religious despotism: it destroys individuality, which is the glory of man and woman.—Rev. F. R. Morse, Baptist, New York City.

The Life Eternal.—This mortal life is but a beginning of the greater existence; it is but the dawn, the preparation for the eternity into which we must pass when the fetters of flesh have loosened their bonds and the immortal soul realizes that stupendous freedom known only in the eternal life.—Rev. J. H. Merchant, Methodist, Akron, Ohio.

The Open Book.—Common education has so brought people to a common level that they are no longer willing to accept the doctrines laid down by the preacher, as in the times when the clergy alone were the learned. The Bible is no longer a sealed book from which precepts are to be picked by the preacher.—Rev. Alfred Kellogg, Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Voice of Conscience.—If the voice of conscience still speaks to you, listen and heed it; for though you may smother conscience here, though you may gag your moral sense, though you may drown all serious thought until you are indifferent to all these things, there will come a time when they will wake to new life again.—Rev. C. S. Hearn, Evangelist, New York City.

Possibilities.—The possibilities of every young man's life are almost infinite. At least, there is no young man, whatever his condition, who may not be noble and true, who may not wear the image of Christ upon his soul, and grow into a manly man, even though he does not rise to any lofty height among his fellows.—Rev. J. R. Miller, Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Pa.

Demonstration.—The religion of Jesus Christ is not all worship and sentiment, but is in practical demonstration. Principles of love and sympathy are beneficent only when they rise above theory. A desire to be useful is the best part of a truly noble character, and quiet purpose in the heart is the essential beginning.—Rev. A. S. Yantes, Episcopalian, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Strikes.—I hope the time will come when some legislative machinery will do away with strikes or settle them at once, and prevent the distress which ensues. The truest friend the workingman ever had was he who was himself a workingman, Jesus Christ, the carpenter of Nazareth. The rich as a whole need Gospel truth to-day more than the poor.—Rev. John Stephens, Methodist, San Francisco, Cal.

Methodism.—The Methodist denomination, from being the smallest and poorest, has now become the richest and largest in the land. It controls 200 colleges and 40,000 schools, in which there are 2,250,000 pupils. When the missionary society was organized in 1819 it secured a gift of $800. Its last year's collection amounted to more than $1,500,000.—Rev. S. E. Howe, Methodist, Boston, Mass.

Church Degeneration.—The world is full of costly church edifices, fine choirs, learned preachers and regenerated, cultivated members. Yet many of these churches and members seem as helpless to reach the lost as is an infant's hand to shatter Gibraltar. They are powerless. Many of these churches look like lighthouses out of which all the light has gone.—Rev. W. H. Pickard, Baptist, Louisville, Ky.

A Natural Magnet.

Professor Smythe was once lecturing in a provincial town on natural philosophy, and in the course of his experiments he introduced a most powerful magnet, with which he attracted a block of iron from a distance of two feet.

"Can any of you conceive a greater attractive power?" demanded the lecturer, with an air of triumph.

"I can," answered a voice from the audience.

"Not a natural terrestrial object?"

"Yes, indeed."

The lecturer, somewhat puzzled, challenged the man who had spoken to name the article. Then up rose old Johnny Sowerby. Said he:

"I will give you facts, professor, and you can judge for yourself. When I was a young man, there was a little piece o' natural magnet done up in a neat cotton dress as was called Betsy Maria. She could draw me 14 miles on Sunday over plowed land, no matter what the wind or weather. There wasn't no resistin' her. That magnet o' yourn is pretty good, but it won't draw so far as Betsy Maria."—Strand Magazine.

But for the English and Scotch half the villas at the French watering places would remain unlet till they fell to pieces, half the shops would be shut and half the hotels would be bankrupt.

There are more wrecks in the Baltic sea than in any other place in the world. The average is one wreck a day throughout the year.

SOMEBODY'S DARLING.

Into the ward of the whitewashed walls
Where the dead and dying lay—
Wounded by bayonets, shells, and balls—
Somebody's darling was borne one day.
Somebody's darling! so young and so brave,
Wearing still on his pale sweet face—
Soon to be hid by the dust of the grave—
The lingering light of his boyhood's grace.

Matted and damp are the curls of gold,
Kissing the snow of that fair young brow;
Pale are the lips of delicate mold—
Somebody's darling is dying now.
Back from the beautiful blue-veined face
Brush every wandering, silken thread;
Cross his hands as a sign of grace—
Somebody's darling is still and dead!

Kiss him once more for somebody's sake;
Murmur a prayer, soft and low;
One bright curl from the cluster take—
They were somebody's pride, you know.
Somebody's hand hath rested there;
Was it a mother's soft and white,
And have the lips of a sister fair
Been baptised in those waves of light?

God knows best. He was somebody's love?
Somebody's heart enshrined him near;
Somebody wafted his name above,
Night and morn, on the wings of prayer.
Somebody wept when he marched away,
Looking so handsome, brave and grand;
Somebody's kiss on his forehead lay;
Somebody clung to his parting hand—

Somebody's watching and waiting for him,
Yearning to hold him again to her heart:
There he lies—with the blue eyes dim,
And smiling, child-like lips apart.
Tenderly bury the fair young dead,
Pausing to drop on his grave a tear,
Carve on the wooden slab at his head,
"Somebody's darling lies buried here!"
—New York Ledger.

"WHO MAKETH ALL."

THE scholar sat in his study before his writing-table, but he did not write. He leaned his elbow on the table and his head on his hand, and he was thinking of Phyllis far away in Rai Pindi with her husband. The table was piled with books—several stood open invitingly—and a fair white sheet of paper lay on his blotting-pad—but he did not write.

Presently Jakes opened the door and said: "There's a young woman, sir, asking to see you; shall I say you're engaged?"

"A young woman, Jakes?" queried the scholar. "What sort of a woman, and from whence?"

"Well, sir," and Jakes closed the door behind him, "I do think she's from the circus as is on the village green."

"From the circus!" repeated the scholar. "What can she want?"

"She won't give no name nor yet no message, sir. Shall I say that you're engaged, sir?"

Jakes considered it the "height of impudence" that a hussy from the circus should dare to ask to see his master, and longed to send her about her business. Fine doings, indeed, for such as she to be asking for gentlemen, as bold as brass!

The scholar pondered, then he said to himself: "Phyllis would like me to see her—she was always kind. Jakes, you can show her in."

Jakes departed, much displeased, and presently ushered a young woman into the room and shut the door after her carefully, and in a fashion that said as plainly as possible: "Well, I wash my hands of this foolhardy proceeding."

The young woman advanced into the middle of the room and then stood awkwardly and said nothing. She was a tall, slight girl, attired in a variety of garments, startling in hue, and having apparently no connection with one another. Her hair was brushed about her forehead and stuck out in a series of large "rolls" behind. The hair was crowned by a hat of portentous size adorned by several rather dejected-looking feathers. But under the furze-bush of hair the face was oval and almost beautiful in its regularity of feature and pure color.

The scholar rose and bowed, then with old-fashioned courtesy he set a chair for her, and having seen her seated, murmured something shyly as "to what he was indebted for the pleasure of this visit?"

The girl stared at him with wide blue eyes, then said, abruptly: "I say, you're a knowin' old cove, aren't you?"

The scholar started a little at this description of himself, and waved his hands in deprecating wise. The girl went on: "I've 'eard in the village as you are always a-studying old books, and knows all sorts of heathenish lingo; now do you know 'ow to make a love poshin?"

The scholar gazed at her in speechless astonishment, then he grasped the edge of his writing-table for support and stammered: "Do I understand you to ask me if I know anything about love philters?"

"Yes, that's the ticket!" said the girl, genially. "I want a love poshin to give my young man. 'E's been and took up with Mad'selle Leonore, what does the trials of strength, and I wants to bring 'im back to me. You give me the perskiption and I'll ask the galipot to make it up. I was sure as you'd know."

The scholar felt quite sorry for her when he realized the disappointment he was about to inflict, she smiled so prettily and looked so pleased. He shook his head, then he said gently: "I'm afraid I am quite unable to help you in this matter. I know nothing of such things, neither do I believe that they can have the smallest effect."

"But I thought you was always a-studyin' ancient days," said the girl in an argumentative voice, leaning forward in her chair. "Do think—in some of them old books" (waving her hand in the direction of the book-lined walls) "Ain't there something in some of them old books?"

"I fear not," sad the scholar, almost sadly, she was so eager, so much in earnest. The girl drew herself up in her chair and said, abruptly:

"I'm a honest girl, I am."

"That I am sure you are, and therefore you need no love philters. Believe me, you are quite pretty and good enough to inspire love, an honest love, without recourse to magic." The scholar spoke persuasively, his voice was very gentle and his manner courtly. The girl winked her wide blue eyes and made a little swallowing motion with her throat, then she coughed and continued:

"My father's brought us up strict, 'e 'ave. 'E doan't 'old with swearin' for women; and if we was light 'e'd lay the 'orse w'ip about our shoulders, 'e would. 'E's clown in our show, 'e is."

There was silence for a minute in the big library, then the scholar said gently: "Why do you want a love philter? Is the—man you are engaged to fickle?"

"Well, 'e runs after Mad'selle Leonore, and I can't stand it, and I rates 'im, and 'e laughs at me, and I'm beastly miserable, I am!"

The girl's voice broke, and great tears rolled down her cheeks. The scholar was much distressed. He was a very learned man, and instructed in the best wisdom of many lands, but he had also studied diligently a book that it requires no great erudition to understand, but only what is quite as rare, a humble heart. A certain saying in that book which runs: "But thou hast mercy upon all, and winkest at the sins of men; because they should amend," came into his mind, and the trouble of this poor circus girl was very real to him. She wiped her eyes with a gayly-bordered pocket-handkerchief, and said:

"What would a lidy do?"

The scholar pondered for a moment then said diffidently, and with extreme shyness: "I think that she would not—show that she minded. That she would try to be always sweet and good-tempered and gracious, above all to Madam What's-her-name. Don't let him think himself so precious, my child. We all value what is hard to obtain. He's too sure of you or he wouldn't tease you. If you are wise, and if he is worth having—if he's worthy of you and of your good father, you'll find that all this nonsense will come to an end as a tale that is told."

It was a long speech for the scholar to make; he flushed a little as he made it, and the circus girl gazed at him admiringly, exclaiming:

"You are a knowin' old cove!"

The scholar shook his head and said humbly: "I fear I am ignorant in these matters. I have only known three women intimately in my life—my mother, my wife, and my daughter."

"Is that what your daughter did—the young lidy as is just married?" she asked eagerly.

"I don't know what she did," answered the scholar gently; and indeed it was true, for the engagement had come upon him as a bolt from the blue while he was thinking of Phyllis as still in pinafores.

"Was she very 'ard to please?" persisted the girl.

Hah Phyllis been hard to please? the scholar asked himself. He did not know. It had not taken long to please her, anyhow; so he said: "I don't know if she was hard to please, but I know that whatever she did was right and sweet and womanly, and you can do all that yourself my dear."

"I wish I was a lidy!" sighed the circus girl; "but father says as one can be as good a girl in a troupe as if one was a scripture reader, 'e do. I see you're a sky pilot by yer choker. What do you say?"

"I quite agree with your father; he must be a most sensible man, and I wish I knew him. Believe me, a circus lady can be just as useful as any other if she will only try, and I am sure you'll try."

The girl rose from her seat, so did the scholar; she held out her hand to him and he took it, and the old man and the girl looked into each other's eyes.

"Good-bye," said the girl; "I'm glad I came, though you are so ignorant about love poshins!"

"I'm very glad you came," said the scholar heartily; "and, believe me, you need no 'love poshins,' you are quite charming enough without!" The girl flushed up to the roots of the furze-brush. Then the scholar said: "Would you like some roses?" The girl said: "Please, sir," in the shyest, smallest voice, and the scholar held the door open for her to pass out. Then he followed her across the hall and through the open front door. He took his pruning-knife from his pocket and he cut a great bunch of the roses that were famed throughout the county, then he walked down the drive with her, and at the lodge gate he bade her good-by.

She started down the road, and then looking back and seeing him still standing at the gate, she ran back, saying breathlessly: "I wish you'd come and see me ride. I can jump through the 'oops beautiful, I can! I should like to show yer."

The scholar's eyes were very kind, but he shook his head, saying: "I'm getting an old man, my dear; I hardly ever go out at night."

"But there's a matinee—an afternoon show"—she explained, "this afternoon."

The scholar wavered, then the beseeching blue eyes caught his and held them. "Phyllis would like me to," he murmured; then—"I will come and see you ride this afternoon."

"I shall look out for you, mind," said the girl; "don't you forget!"

The scholar did not forget—he went! —Windsor Magazine.

CHAT OF THE CHURCH

WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE RELIGIOUS WORLD.

News Notes from All Lands Regarding Their Religious Thought and Movement —What the Great Denominations Are Doing.

That True Spirit.

YOU should make a a special point of asking God every morning to give you, before all else, that true spirit of meekness which He would have His children possess. You must also make a firm resolution to practice yourself in this virtue, especially in your intercourse with those persons to whom you chiefly owe it. You must make it your main object to conquer yourself in this matter; call it to mind a hundred times during the day, commending your efforts to God. It seems to me that no more than this is needed in order to subject your soul entirely to His will, and then you will become more gentle day by day, trusting wholly in His goodness. You will be very happy, my dearest child, if you can do this, for God will dwell in your heart; and where He reigns all is peace. But if you should fail, and commit some of your old faults do not be disheartened, but rise up and go on again, as though you had not fallen.—Francis de Sales.

An Unfortunate.

The man who has nothing to do is unfortunate. We were made to work. For that reason there is a joy in achieving. Our reward is not measured by the pay we receive. Our satisfaction is in the success we have in beholding the results of our endeavors. In the church the same rule holds. Some good people are spoiling for want of good works. The spirit languishes unless it renews its strength in the service of the Lord. Spiritual achievement and spiritual vigor go hand in hand.

The Instincts of the Heart.

Give free and bold play to those instincts of the heart which believe that the Creator must care for the creatures He has made, and that the only real effective care for them must be that which takes each of them into His love, and knowing it separately surrounds it with His separate sympathy. There is not one life which the Lifegiver ever loses out of His sight; not one which sins so that He casts it away; not one which is not so near to Him that whatever touches them touches Him with sorrow or with joy.—Phillips Brooks.

Prayers I Don't Like.

I do not like to hear him pray,
Who loans at twenty-five per cent.;
For then I think the borrower may
Be pressed for food and rent;
And in that Book we all should heed,
Which says the lender shall be blest,
As sure as I have eyes to read,
"It does not say, 'Take interest.'"

I do not like to hear him pray,
On bended knee about an hour,
For "grace to spend aright the day,"
Who knows his neighbor has no flour.
I'd rather see him go to mill,
And buy the luckless brother bread,
And see his children eat their fill
And laugh beneath their humble shed.

I do not like to hear him pray,
"Let blessings on the widow be,"
Who never seeks her home to say,
"If want o'ertakes you, come to me."
I hate the prayer so long and loud,
That's offered for the orphan's weal,
By him who sees him crushed by wrong,
And only with his lips doth feel.

I do not like to hear her pray
With jeweled hands and silken dress,
Whose washerwoman toils all day,
And then is asked to "work for less."
Such pious shavers I despise!
With folden hands, a face demure,
They lift to heaven their "angel eyes,"
Then steal the earnings of the poor.

I do not like such soulless prayers—
If wrong, I hope to be forgiven;
No angel's wing them upward bears;
They're lost a million miles from heaven.
—The Christian.

Love to God.

Let us look into this word love. Love to man may mean several things. It may mean love to his person, which is very different from himself, or it may mean simply pity. Love to God can only mean one thing. God is character. To love God is to love His character. For instance, God is purity. And to be pure in thought and look, to turn away from unhallowed books and conversations, to abhor the moment in which we have not been pure is to love God. God is love; and to love men till private attachments have expanded into a philanthropy which embraces all, at least even the evil and enemies, with compassion—that is love to God. God is truth. To be true, to hate every form of falsehood, to live a brave, true, real life—that is to love God. God is infinite; and to love the boundless, reaching on from grace to grace, adding charity to faith, and rising upward ever to see the ideal still above us, and to die with it unattained, aiming insatiably to be perfect, even as the father is perfect—that is to love God.—F. W. Robertson.

Wasting Talk.

All human beings need instruction, counsel, guidance in a greater or less degree. No one person nows or can know everything. Some through age, experience and wisdom are qualified to be counselors and advisers. Others will not do this. They are indifferent to the welfare of those around them, and allow them to go their way and take the consequences. Others, more careful and sympathetic, seek to save the young from the evils and troubles which their experience might bring upon them. Often, however, they labor in vain; their advice is unwelcome and their words are wasted. It is useless to try to pour water into a corked bottle, or to give advice to some conceited youth who knows it already, and who turns up a pretty nose, and goes on regardless of the counsel of friends, parents or any one else. There is one school for such persons. It is a dear one. It is a school of experience. Its lessons are enforced by blighted hopes, ruined health, broken hearts; but it is the only school in which certain persons can be taught. They hate knowledge, they despise instruction. Foolishness is bound up in their hearts, and only affliction, disappointment and sorrow can drive it from them.

Example.

We scatter seeds with careless hand,
And dream we ne'er shall see them more;
But for a thousand years
Their fruit appears,
In weeds that mar the land
Or healthful store.

The deeds we do, the words we say,
Into still air they seem to fleet;
We count them ever past;
But they shall last—
In the dread judgment they
And we shall meet.

I charge thee by the years gone by,
For the love of brethren dear,
Keep, then, the one true way
In work and play,
Lest in the world their cry
Of woe thou hear.

A Christian Nation.

David Agnew, ex-Chief Justice of Pennsylvania, who is now eighty-eight years of age, has recently delivered an address which has been published, intended to demonstrate the Christianity of the Constitution of the United States. After giving the subject a thorough discussion, Judge Agnew says: "In conclusion, I have shown (conclusively, I think) that this is a Christian nation; that this continent and the provinces were settled by a Christian people; that the states formed from them continued Christian, and set the legal evidence of their belief in their early constitutions; that other religions are exceptional and were tolerated for individual conscience' sake only; that the Constitution of the United States, formed by the same people contemporary with their state constitutions, and with identical provisions for the toleration of individual freedom of conscience, expressly reserved to them all their ungranted rights, among which are their Christian institutions; that the Constitution itself carries internal evidence of its Christian character, and that its continued existence rests on the fabric of the states; and that infidels, pagans, cavilers and Mormons derive from it no support in their warfare against Christianity. I have shown, also, that the safety of this Christian character, peace, order and prosperity demand its citizenship to be protected against promiscuous and loose naturalization."

Smoking in Church.

It will be news to many of your readers, says a contributor to London Sketch, that there is a church near London where smoking is permitted. That church, I understand, is at Stratford. But it will be greater news that the pipe is, in some places within the British Isles, an actual religious symbol. When I was visiting Connemara two or three months ago, I found an interesting relic of folk-lore customs among some of the inhabitants. Whenever a man of the village is buried his friends and neighbors place their pipes on his grave, duly filled with tobacco. Not content with this, they renew both pipes and tobacco from time to time. There are at least two churchyards near Leenane, in Galway, where you come across grave after grave decorated with pipes. This must, of course, be a variation on the old practice of placing food and drink in the dead man's coffin.

Stumbling Blocks.

Stumbling blocks seem to be plenty everywhere. Stumbling blocks for the children, stumbling blocks for the young people, stumbling blocks for the old people. It is hard for us sometimes to see where we are stumbling others and it is hard for some others to see how and where the church of God is such a stumbling block as it is to-day in the face of temperance. The church is doing a grand and noble work, and yet, as it has never stood together on the great question of temperance—the special topic for to-day—it is well worth while for us to face this fact. It seems strange that all of God's people should not be ready and glad and determined to stand as one man against the gigantic evil of intemperance that has been preached about, talked about for these years and years.

An Inch Plug.

A good, humble Christian brother had "a call" to become the pastor of a city church. He declined the offer, and when asked why he refused such an opportunity, said:

"You cannot stop a two-inch hole with an inch plug."

The man knew his strength and his weakness, and thus it is probable saved himself from the mortification which has so many times resulted from men undertaking things which were beyond their ability.

There are those who are reaching after the highest positions that they can possibly obtain, though in many cases the only result of their obtaining them will be to demonstrate their own inefficiency and unfitness for those positions. It is well for a man to understand his weakness, to know what he can do and to remember that it is impossible to "stop a two-inch hole with an inch plug." Many a man has tried it, and tried it in vain. Others will still try it, but some will learn the lesson, and save themselves disappointment and mortification.—The Christian.

FARM AND GARDEN

Corn Fodder Barrow.

The National Stockman describes how to make a barrow for hauling corn-fodder.

The two side pieces A are 6 feet long and 1½ inches by 3 inches. The uprights B are 2 feet long and 2 inches by 1½ inches. The crosspieces C are 2 feet long and 2 feet apart and 3 inches wide by 1½ inches. The straps D are pieces of old carriage tire bent as shown. The legs are fastened on with a single bolt and the uprights by a log screw. The braces for the uprights are notched in and nailed. When it is desired to use the barrow for grass, put in a floor of half inch white pine, also nail half inch boards from B 1 to B 2 and fit in sideboards from B 2 to B 2 and from B 1 to B 1. White pine or cypress will be strong enough for the dimensions given. If heavier wood is used, use smaller size.

BARROW FOR CORN FODDER.

The Care of Milk.

The following is a compilation of directions given by some of the Western cheese factories in connection with the care of milk.

Place cans in cold water immediately after milking.

Place the milk in cool water soon after milking is done.

Place cans in cold water at once. Cool quickly.

Practice cleanliness with a big C.

Milk pails, strainers, and coolers should be washed and scalded at each milking.

Rinse cans in warm water, scald with hot water, and air as much as possible.

Have cans washed and scalded thoroughly and well aired.

Stir the milk at least two or three times while cooling.

When the milk is cooling, cover the cans with cheese-cloth.

Do not put covers on the cans over night, but use a thin cloth.

Always leave covers off the milk until the animal heat has disappeared.

Never mix morning's milk with night's milk until both are thoroughly cold.

If warm milk is added to cold, it produces a taint at once.

Posts as Foundations.

Cedar posts are often used to support buildings and doubtless would be more frequently used if the frost did not work upon buildings thus supported lifting them out of position and racking them. It does this when the posts extend below the frost line since the ground freezes to the sides of the posts and thus raises them. Put a square box about the posts as shown in the cut. The frost will then lift the box, but cannot disturb the posts.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Ripening Tomatoes Under Cover.

It is the habit of many tomato growers as the danger of frost becomes imminent to pull up a number of tomato vines with a little earth attached, and throw them with their unripe fruit into some building where the unripe tomatoes will gradually turn, and the smaller ones will increase in size and finally ripen also. In this way it is possible to have tomatoes fresh from the vine until near the Christmas holidays. Tomatoes fully grown will color if picked and laid on the shelf. But they are not nearly as good as fruit that is ripened on the vine, which apparently continues to perfect the fruit even after its roots have been pulled from the ground.

Threshing Damp Grain.

It is never good economy to thresh grain while the straw is damp. So long as grain is in its chaff, that protects it from heating either in mow or stack. So long as threshing was done by hand there was no temptation to thresh it until frost had dried it out. Now that steam power for threshing has replaced the horse power, it does not seem so much waste to thresh damp grain. Yet many straw stacks will be green with grain wasted because even the steam threshing machine cannot get it out. Besides, after threshing, the damp grain is much more liable to injury by heating than it was before.

Rain vs. Irrigation.

It is sometimes said that the farmer who depends wholly on irrigation is really better off than those who farm where rainfall is usually sufficient. The man who irrigates has the control of moisture supply in his own hands. But this does not wholly apply to fruit growing. In arid climates air, as well as soil, must be kept moist to develop the best fruit. For many years California fruit was dry and poor in quality, though fine looking. Now California air in the dry season is less arid than it used to be, and its fruit is better.

Chestnut Trees Profitable.

Those who have a chestnut grove and keep it free from depredators may find it a source of profit. We know one or two such groves which yield returns with no labor except for gathering the nuts better than could be got for usual farm crops. But to secure profitable returns the public must be excluded. Men and boys who club the trees while the nuts are green to bring them down will disfigure and injure the trees, so that after a few years the trees will yield little or nothing. Chestnut trees, if the fruit is of good quality are valuable property, and their fruit should be protected. There are several improved varieties of chestnut, some of which will begin bearing when three years old. These should be chosen if new plantations of chestnuts are to be made, or scions of the new varieties should be grafted into native stock.—American Cultivator.

Value of Grain Chaff.

When threshing grain framers should appreciate the necessity of separating the grain chaff from the straw for winter feeding. If the straw is to be sold for bedding or used for bedding at home it will go farther if free from chaff. The latter is much the best part of the straw to feed. When nature makes the grain, all the valuable nutrition is concentrated in or near the head. Some of this remains in the chaff. There are besides some light grains that are usually blown out with the chaff in cleaning.

Chickens in Hot Weather.

The sudden dying of young chicks in hot weather is almost always caused by lice. Look around the head and neck, and a few big fellows may be seen which torment the chicken so that it cannot be thrifty. Rub some grease of any kind about the head and neck and under the wings. This is sure death to the pests and does the chicks no harm. It is well to use it as a preventive, for if lice get on the chicks in hot weather, many chicks will die before the remedy can be applied.

Burning Weeds.

It is far better to rot the weeds by burying them under the soil while green than to rely on burning them after they have ripened their seeds. It is commonly supposed that when a weed is burned, its seed also perishes. Only if piled on brush, which will make coals of fire at the bottom of the heap, is this the case. The weed seed drops as the pod which encloses it shrivels with heat, and as carbonic acid gas settles to the bottom of the heap, the noxious seed is preserved from burning.

Corn on Outside Rows.

In cutting corn we always used to notice that the outside rows where the horse turned in cultivation had generally larger and better filled ears than did the corn farther in the field. This indicates that corn is usually planted too closely and does not get sunlight enough. The outside row is not generally richer than the soil farther in the field, and certainly the trampling of the ground by the horses' feet is no advantage to the crop.

Grasses.

The best kind of grasses to sow upon a marsh subject to overflow, according to some of the best authorities, are four pounds red top, two of fowl meadow grass, four of timothy and one or two of alsike clover per acre. In many cases low lands can be easily drained or partially freed of water by the digging of one or two ditches. If this can be done, it surely should be practiced, for low lands are the richest and best for grasses.

Farms Under Glass.

It is prophesied that the farmer of the future will grow his crops under glass. Hot-house fruits and vegetables may then be raised for the poor and needy on a very cheap scale. Vast sections of land may be roofed over ith glass, and a perpetual summer climate will make the plants and trees and vines flourish as in the tropics.

Boiled Oil.

A gallon of boiled oil well soaked in will furnish a protecting cover for all the farm wagons, plow handles, horse rakes, etc., on the farm, keeping the weather from them and thus saving the cost a dozen times. It should be put on hot.

Quince Hedges.

In the English colonies of Africa hedges are commonly made of quince-trees. The branches, being planted and interwoven by hand, form an impenetrable barrier to cattle, and they annually bear an immense crop of large fruit.

Objections to Late Haying.

The late cut hay, even if secured without rain, has lost much of its nutritive value. It has also impaired the vigor of the root, so that next year's hay crop will be lighter than if the grass this year had been cut early.

Making Them Familiar.

Heifers that are to be in milk by and by ought to be kept with the milking herd that they may get accustomed to the sounds and excitement of domestication. Their product will vary less by and by at the pail.

A Pertinent Query.

"I don't believe in anything I can't see," said the young man who aims to be considered a skeptic.

The middle-aged man with overalls on looked at him pensively for a moment and then inquired:

"Young feller, did you ever ketch hold of a 'lectric wire?"—Washington Star.

Some Large Fruit Yields.

An orchard of 90 trees in New Canaan, Ct., produced 206 barrels of picked apples the eighth season from planting. A 15-year-old tree in the same neighborhood yielded 12 barrels of choice, picked apples. A grower in Ontario county, New York, sold 379 barrels from his orchard of 1½ acres and in addition had between 300 and 400 bushels of paring and cider apples. A tree in Glastonbury, Ct., produced 95 bushels of apples. In 1891 Hale Bros., of Connecticut sold about $24,000 worth of peaches from 35 acres.—American Agriculturist.

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 19 1897

The price of wheat is still going down. That "wave" needs bracing from some quarter, and we suggest that the president order the price of California fruit elevated just for a change.

F. O. Wilkinson, a former policeman in Los Angeles, has struck a rich lead of gold ore in the old Wheel of Fortune mine in Kern county. At a depth of 55 feet he has found ore that assays $2504 a ton.

In the Stringer mining district, five miles south of Johannesburg, plows are used to loosen the auriferous gravel and prepare it for the dry washers. It is probably the only place in the world where a gold-bearing stratum is worked with plows.

If C. M. Shortridge has any friends left in San Jose they ought to persuade him to hire some one to keep him from making a fool of himself through the columns of his paper. Some of his utterances of a personal nature would lead one to believe that Charlie is a fit subject for an insane asylum.

The gold Democrats throughout the country voted the Republican ticket last Tuesday, yet we find the followers of Bryan victorious in many places while the Republican majorities of a year ago were cut down in all cases. Evidently that "wave of prosperity" has not yet settled the gold standard on this country permanently.

Henry Watterson has been making a hard fight to establish the gold Democratic party, but when he saw the men he was working with vote the Republican ticket he quit and henceforth will accept the verdict as settled that the Democratic party is to champion and finally restore bimetallism to this country by the free and independent coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

The Miners' Union at Randsburg sent a delegation of its members to the Roxie mine to peremptorily order the Superintendent and men out of the camp for working below the regular wages of the Union, which is $3 a day. One of the miners joined the Union and was permitted to remain, and the others left town with their blankets on their backs. The Superintendent, C. N. Clark, is a part owner in the mine, and he will call upon the authorities for protection.

Says the Randsburg Miner: At the Baron mine over in the Rademacher district everything looks very favorable. The ore is rich in sulphurets and is all of high grade, much of it running from $800 to $1200 per ton. The shaft is down 100 feet and a drift 126 feet in length has been run. No person knows the extent of the vein, as the hanging wall has not yet been discovered, although a crossent of twenty feet from the foot wall has been made. The Baron is owned by E. Downing of Visalia.

How to Stop Lynching

Governor Atkinson of Georgia in hi recent message to the Legislature of that State devoted considerable space to the subject of lynchings, which are becoming more frequent in the south every year. He showed that in Georgia alone there had been twenty-two lynchings during the past three years.

He takes the unnecessary trouble to prove that such illegal executions are very undesirable, and then goes on to suggest a remedy, after assuring the Legislature that the responsibility rests partly with those who do not make laws that will prevent lynching. He believes that the most necessary change is greater promptness in the trials and punishment of criminals, and the enactment of laws that will prevent the legal delays that weary the patience of citizens.

He believes, too, that there should be more rigid investigations into the conduct of law officers who surrender prisoners to mobs, and that, if it be found that they have not properly protected their prisoners, they should be severely punished. With these two changes, he believes that lynching would soon become a thing of the past.

There cannot be any doubt that the Governor is correct. Prompt trial and prompt legal execution would put an end to prompt illegal executions. But while there are Supreme Courts in States and in the United States, and while there are large numbers of impecunious lawyers who are trying very hard to make a living, and many of whom are in the legislature, he will find that it will be a hard thing to promptly execute a criminal in a legal way. The Legislature will not pass such new laws until there is an overwhelming public opinion in favor of it, and that overwhelming public opinion has not yet come. Some day it will come all over the United States and judges will be forced to pass the death sentence promptly in murder cases. The prisons will not then be crowded as they now are with men who should have been hanged months or years before.

But to secure that end new laws are not so much needed as the proper enforcement of the old ones. If public feeling were so strong that a judge would forfeit his chances of re-election if he dawdled over a murder case, he would very quickly find he had power to expedite it even under the present laws.—Post.

THE CHIN AS AN INDEX.

Can You Tell a Person's Character by the Shape of His Lower Jaw?

I have read Dr. Leuf's letter on "Physiognomy" in The Medical Council and am prompted to say, in reply to his request for contributions on the "chin:"

Protruding chins characterize men and women of the get-there type. Successful people usually carry their chins thrust forward, with compressed lips. This chin, if heavy, with broad rami and swelling masseters, indicates fighting blood.

A retreating chin shows lack of force, mentally, morally and physically; usually of the yielding sort; soon discouraged; desires protection; small executive force. The development of other faculties often makes up for this defect.

A small, well rounded chin, with mobile and red cushion of flesh upon, indicates a pleasure loving owner. If dimpled, all the more so, for dimpled chins belong to coquettes. People with dimples love to be petted and loved; like admiration and praise. Generally fickle. Usually this chin is healthy, recuperative and long lived.

Broad chins signify nobleness and large dignity, unless vertically thin, when, if with it there be thin lips of bloodless kind, you find cruelty.

Square chins with little flesh denote firmness and executive ability. These make good haters.

Drunkards usually have a circular line about their chins.

Slovens have wrinkles about their chins.

Long, thin chins are poetical, unstable and delicate in constitution. Such people are subject to bowel derangements. If thin through the angles of the mouth, too, they are prone to tuberculosis. Generally short lived.

Medium chins with a suggestive bifurcation in the center, with small mounds of flesh on either side, characterize generosity, impulsiveness, cheery natures. (The same sized chins, with a dab of flesh just under the center of the lower lip, indicate meanness, selfishness, brutality.)

N. B.—No one feature can be taken in judging character. Often development of other faculties of mind or feature entirely governs. In each case take the "totality of indications" before judging.—St. Louis Clinique.

ROBERT BURNS.

The Poet's First Love and the Verses In Which He Praised Her.

Robert Burns, the Scottish poet, was born at Mount Oliphant, Jan. 25, 1759, near Ayr, in a clay built cottage, reared by his father's own hands. When a lad of 18, the family moved to Lochlea. His first three or four years at Lochlea were still with the poet times of innocence, and "his conduct was governed by the strictest rules of virtue and modesty." At last he set his affections on a young woman named Ellison Begbie, the daughter of a small farmer, and asked her to be his wife, but he could not prevail on her to marry him, and this disappointment had a malign influence over the poet. Long afterward, when he had seen much of the world, Burns spoke of this girl as, of all those on whom he ever fixed his fickle affections, the one most likely to have made a pleasant partner for life. It was to her he addressed the pure and beautiful love lyric "Mary Morison," and in these lines the lyric genius of Burns was for the first time undeniably revealed:

Yestreen when to the trembling string
The dance gaed through the lighted ha',
To thee my fancy took its wing,
I sat, but neither heard nor saw,
Though this was fair and that was braw
And yon the toast of a' the town,
I sighed and said amang them a',
"Ye are nae Mary Morison."

Oh, Mary, canst thou wreck his peace
Wha for thy sake would gladly dee?
Or canst thou break that heart of his
Whase only fault is loving thee?
If love for love thou wilt not gie,
At least be pity to me shown,
A thought ungentle canna be
The thought of Mary Morison.

—Boston Woman's Journal.

The Science of the Morning Fast.

Dr. E. H. Dewey says that the heavy morning breakfast which is universal in America is all a mistake. The hunger one feels is abnormal and is simply the acquired result of a lifelong untimely meal. More than this, it is often disease undergoing evolution, and many complaints are cured simply by not taking anything beyond a small cup of tea or coffee, and sometimes not even that, until 11 or 12 o'clock. The experience of hundreds of persons proves that even the severest manual labor can be performed for several hours "on an empty stomach" and with more ease, energy and satisfaction than ever is possible after an early morning meal, and that it can be done even up to high noon without unusual exhaustion or inconvenience from the pangs of hunger. A great many people are now giving this matter a prolonged test, and the wisdom of the method is clearly supported by physiological evidence.—Exchange.

By Canoe From Coast to Coast.

Mr. F. C. Nicholas recently described the goldfields of western Colombia for the geological section of the New York Academy of Sciences, and incidentally pointed out a route by which, in the wet season, a man might go in a canoe from the Atlantic to the Pacific across the northwestern corner of South America. The proposed route follows the river Atrato to the divide, which lies in a series of swamps, and then, by way of one or two smaller streams, reaches the river San Juan, which empties into the Pacific.

Inoculation of land with microbes instead of expending money on fertilizers is the latest idea which science has placed at the service of the British farmer.

The boiler tubes of a large liner, if placed in a row, would stretch nearly 10 miles and the condenser tubes more than 25 miles.

Insulting.

"Count or baron?" he asked politely.

She gave him a haughty glance and walked out.—Chicago Post.

A Railroad Rumor.

A dispatch from Los Angeles says: "A railroad story floating about the city which has caused considerable uneasiness among Southern Pacific people, appears to have originated with Nat Wilshire, a well-known mining expert, who has several valuable properties near Randsburg and along the line of the Southern Pacific. The report is that the builders of the Randsburg Railway from Kramer are simply going to Randsburg as a means to an end; that the real destination of the line is to be Bakersfield, where connection will be made with the Valley Railway from San Francisco, which will give the Santa Fe a through connection to the metropolis, independent of the Southern Pacific. The distance to be covered will only be something like 124 miles, and, according to Wilshire, the grades will be easy and inexpensive. Inquiry about the story brought to light a plan of the Southern Pacific of the utmost importance to this city. This is the building of a branch line from Mojave, not only to Randsburg, but past that camp to Keeler, which is the southern terminus of the Carson and Colorado narrow-gauge road. The latter now has all the rich mining trade of the western portion of Nevada and the southeastern counties of this State, including Inyo county. The construction of the line by the way of Randsburg would bring all this valuable traffic back again to this city, and form another overland route by way of Carson to the far East."

His First Chance.

"Is there a man in all the audience," demanded the female speaker on woman's rights, fiercely, "that has ever done anything to lighten the burden resting on his wife's shoulders? What do you know of woman's work? Is there a man here," she continued, folding her arms and looking over her audience with superb scorn, "that has ever got up in the morning, leaving his tired, wornout wife to enjoy her slumbers, gone quietly down stairs, made the fire, cooked his own breakfast, sewed the missing buttons on the children's shoes, darned the family stockings, scoured the pots and kettles, cleaned and filled the lamps, swept the kitchen, and done all this, if necessary, day after day uncomplainingly? If there is such a man in this audience, let him stand up. I should like to see him.

And far back in the hall a mild-looking man in spectacles, in obedience to the summons, timidly arose. He was the husband of the eloquent speaker. It was the first chance he ever had to assert himself.—Tit Bits.

The Wedding.

The residence of Mrs. Fredericka Rhine was the scene of one of the prettiest weddings witnessed here for many months last Saturday at 5:30 p. m. Miss Anna Hermann and Frederick Strohmeyer of George's Creek were united in marriage Rev. T. H. Nicholas officiating. The bride looked charming in a robe of white brocaded silk, a bridal veil and laurel wreath. The young folks who participated in the charivari were royally treated, and a warm reception was tendered the couple on their arrival at their home in George's Creek. May they live long and prosper.

Number of boys enrolled 6; girls 6; total 12.

Miss M. M. GREGORY, Teacher.

The three-year-old boy of J. A. Johnson of Lynn Center, Ill., is subject to attacks of croup. Mr. Johnson says he is satisfied that the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, during a severe attack, saved his little boy's life. He is in the drug business, a member of the firm of Johnson Bros. of that place; and they handle a great many patent medicines for throat and lung diseases. He had all these to chose from, and skilled physicians ready to respond to his call, but selected this remedy for use in his own family at a time when his child's life was in danger, because he knew it to be superior to any other, and famous the country over for its cures of croup. Mr. Johnson says this is the best selling cough medicine they handle, and that it gives splendid satisfaction in all cases. Sold by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Kings River canyon, into which a railroad is now being built, was described by John Muir in one of the magazines a few years as another Yosemite. When made accessible by rail from Fresno it ought to become a favorite resort for Californians and tourists alike. Sequoia groves, waterfalls, precipices and snowy peaks are all there to satisfy the curiosity which is repelled from Yosemite by the trouble and cost of getting there over stage roads.

"The worst cold I ever had in my life was cured by Chamberlain's Cough Remedy," writes W. H. Norton, of Sutter Creek, Cal. "This cold left me with a cough, and I was expectorating all the time. The Remedy cured me, and I want all of my friends when troubled with a cough or cold to use it, for it will do them good." Sold by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Bimetallism and the Recent Elections

The Republicans at St. Louis pledged the party to bimetallism by international agreement, and in the campaign convinced thousands of Silver Republicans that this could and would be done and that our country would have free coinage of silver. To carry out this the President appointed commissioners at great cost to our people. These commissioners at once entered on their duty and find that France seems to be willing; Germany says, "we defer to England, if she leads we will follow;" England ignores the whole matter, not only free coinage in England, but she refuses to open the mints of India to silver or to consent for the bank of England to keep a silver reserve up to the legal limit.

Well informed men of all parties knew in the beginning that bimetallism by international agreement was a fraud, and was done to deceive Silver Republicans. They said: "We are bimetallists; vote for us and we will send men abroad to say to the commercial nations that we want bimetallism and we will get it, and silver will be coined." The Republican silver voters believed it and voted for McKinley. The international failure was known by many before the late election, while the majority remained in the dark. The result was a loss of nearly a half million votes to the Republican party in the election just past. New York and Kentucky placed themselves in the Bryan ranks. Ohio, the home of McKinley, Sherman and Hanna, are a stand-off, so too with Maryland. The Republicans in these two states lose nearly one hundred thousand Silver Republican votes, and the silver vote largely increased in all the states. Silver Republicans now see that silver cannot win in the hands of Gold-bug Republicans; they see international bimetallism is a failure, and hence they are following Teller and the rest into the Bryan Silver ranks. Silver is the cause of this landslide. If not, please tell us what.

Mr. Watterson says the issue was clear and explicit and he did all he could to maintain his views, and he further says: "We may regret the verdict, but we accept it;" and he adds, "We are Democrats, not Republicans." We welcome the return of Mr. Watterson to Democratic principles as declared by the party. Had he accepted the Chicago platform, ate his crow and stayed with his party it would have been better for all. We have as strong convictions as Mr. Watterson. In part they were not met in the Chicago platform, but as a Democrat we yielded to the majority and stayed with our party. Mr. Watterson is a son of Democracy; he strayed from the house of his father, he now returns and we advise the family to receive him in kindness. He has accepted his father's rule and that is all he can do.—John P. Moore in Colusa Sun.

Science Utilizes All the Ox.

In an article on the "Wonders of the World's Waste," William George Jordan, in the October Ladies Home Journal, details how science at the present day utilizes the ox. "Not many years ago," he says, "when an ox was slaughtered forty per cent of the animal was wasted; at the present time nothing is lost but its dying breath.' As but one-third of the weight of the animal consists of produce that can be eaten, the question of utilizing the waste is a serious one. The blood is used in refining sugar and in sizing paper or manufactured into door-knobs and buttons. The hide goes to the tanner; horns and hoofs are transformed into combs and buttons; thigh-bones, worth eighty dollars per ton, are cut into handles for clothes-brushes; fore-leg bones sell for thirty dollars per ton for collar buttons, parasol handles and jewelry; the water in which bones are boiled is reduced to glue; the dust from sawing the bones is food for cattle and poultry; the smallest bones are made into boneblack. Each foot yields a quarter of a pint of neats-foot oil; the tail goes to the "soup;" while the brush of hair at the end of the tail is sold to the mattress-maker. The choice parts of the fat make the basis of butterine, the intestines are used for sausage casings or bought by gold beaters. The undigested food in the stomach, which formerly cost the packers of Chicago thirty thousand dollars a year to remove and destroy, is now made into paper. These are but a few of the products of abattoirs. All scraps unfit for any other use find welcome in the glue-pot, or they do missionary work for farmers by acting as fertilizers."

Henry Dover is back from the Panamint country with some wonderfully rich specimens of rock taken from a mine in which he is interested. The ledge is fifteen feet in thickness and was discovered about one and one-half years ago. The mine promises to be one of the richest yet discovered on the desert.—Bakersfield Californian.

Croup Quickly Cured.

JIM AND JOHN.

Jim and John were townsmen and chums, and went out to see baseball. It was a red-hot afternoon, and the bleachers were like frying-pans at breakfast time. Jim had a bald head and John had a crick in the back. They sat for an underdone roast and laughed at everything. Jim's bald spot was a shining mark, like a brass door-plate. A stray ball, fierce and sharp, from a false bat, struck the spot and ploughed a furrow. It dazed him. Jim's eyes and face looked like a sick owl's, and John laughed. He laughed an hour straight along. The game ran late into twilight. Meanwhile, John had shed his coat, and a cool, damp draught got in its work on his back. The time came to leave, but John couldn't. He couldn't bend or get up. Lumbago had set in in its worst form. He laughs best who laughs last, and Jim had revenge. But they got down town to Jim's room, when he said, "Here's something all those athletes use for hurts and ailments, and it's the best known cure for lame back. He rubbed it on John's back and some on his own head. They were both feeling cured and comfortable from the use of St. Jacobs Oil, which Jim always kept in a handy place. He was a sport himself and knew what was best. They went to bed. John laughed in his sleep. Both rose in the morning fresh as daisies; then Jim laughed at John.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

We are asserting in the courts our right to the exclusive use of the word "CASTORIA," and "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," as our Trade Mark.

I, Dr. Samuel Pitcher, of Hyannis, Massachusetts, was the originator of "PITCHER'S CASTORIA," the same that has borne and does now bear the fac simile signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on every wrapper. This is the original "PITCHER'S CASTORIA" which has been used in the homes of the mothers of America for over thirty years. Look Carefully at the wrapper and see that it is the kind you have always bought, and has the signature of CHAS. H. FLETCHER on the wrapper. His Last Law Case.

The late William S. Groesbeck of Cincinnati never took another law case after his defense of President Andrew Johnson. "The brilliant speech which won that case," says the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, "proved the man's remarkable will and intellectual powers. He had been so ill as to be confined to his bed, and on the day of the trial, and while lying in bed, he jotted down on a sheet of foolscap paper the main points of his defense. He was driven to the tribunal in a carriage, unable to walk, and spoke extempore for four hours and a half. At the close article 11 was voted upon and the president acquitted without the taking up of any of the other articles. Since that time Mr. Groesbeck had lived a life of quiet and retirement. In 1872 he built Elmhurst, a noble house of superb proportions, commanding a river view of unsurpassed beauty."

The story of "Enoch Arden," as it stands in the poem, is in every detail a true one. It was related to Lord Tennyson by the late Mr. Woolner, the well known sculptor, whose widow has the manuscript of the story.

The reciprocal civility of authors is one of the most risible scenes in the farce of life.—Johnson.

At the beginning of a recent thundershower, after a warm and windless day, M. Maurice Despres, of Cordova, Spain, noticed electrified drops that cracked faintly on touching the ground and emitted sparks. The phenomenon lasted several seconds, ceasing as the air became moistened.

The first use of the phonograph in telegraphy seems to have been in Spain, where receiving operators were unable to take down rapidly enough messages received by telephone and repeated the messages into a phonograph. This repetition, being heard at the sending end, serves also as a control for the correctness of the message.

The towering Washington monument, solid as it is, cannot resist the heat of the sun, poured on its southern side on a midsummer's day, without a slight bending of the gigantic shaft which is rendered perceptible by means of a copper wire, 174 feet long, hanging in the center of the structure, and carrying a plummet suspended in a vessel of water. At noon in summer the apex of the monument, 550 feet above the ground, is shifted, by expansion of the stone, a few hundredths of an inch toward the north. High winds cause perceptible motions of the plummet, and in still weather delicate vibrations of the crust of the earth, otherwise unperceived, are registered by it.

Strange stories are sometimes told of the wonderful things that have fallen in rain-storms. Occasionally it is frogs, again it is splashes of blood, or some mineral, such as sulphur. Frequently there is a foundation for these stories, and investigation furnishes an explanation of the phenomena. At Bordeaux for many years, in April and May, so-called "rains of sulphur" have been noticed, when the earth becomes spotted with what seem to be patches of sulphur brought down by the rain. This phenomenon was recently the subject of a scientific investigation, and it was shown that the supposed sulphur was really the yellow pollen of a species of pine, large forests of which exist south and southwest of Bordeaux. The rains referred to occur at the time of the flowering of the pines, the pollen of which must be carried to a great height in the air.

Mr. Ravenstein, of the Royal Geographical Society, estimates that the fertile lands of the globe amount to 28,000,000 square miles, the steppes to 14,000,000 and the deserts to 1,000,000. Fixing 207 persons to the square mile for fertile lands, ten for steppes and one for deserts as the greatest population that the earth could properly nourish, he arrives at the conclusion that when the number of inhabitants reaches about 6,000,000,000, our planet will be peopled to its full capacity. At present it contains about one-quarter of that number. If the rate of increase shown by recent census statistics should be uniformly maintained, Mr. Ravenstein shows that the globe would be fully peopled about the year 2072. But such calculations do not allow for unknown sources of error, and must not be taken too literally.

WHIPPED GUILTY AND INNOCENT

A Singular Mode of Punishment Among the Nez Perce Indians.

The Nez Perce Indians during the winter formerly lived in communal lodges, which were from 100 to 150 feet in length and 20 feet wide. Twenty or more families occupied one of these long lodges; their fires were about 10 feet apart, and between every two fires an elongated entrance projected from the side of the structure, with closely woven mats hung at the outer and inner openings, writes Alice C. Fletcher in the Century.

The discipline of the children of a village was delegated to certain men called Pe-wet-ta-te-pats (the whippers). They were appointed by the chiefs, and inspired a wholesome awe in quarrelsome and disobedient boys and girls, and, indeed, in the whole juvenile population; for when any children in a lodge were reported as needing punishment, all the little folk were forced to share in it. The hour for this exercise was just at dark; and when the well-known step of the whipper was heard approaching, and the mat was lifted and fell behind him, every youngster began to howl in anticipation of approaching woe. The last one to lie down on his face and receive his thrashing was the really guilty one, that he might have the benefit of prolonged anticipation. The hubbub in the lodge at the hour of discipline is easier to fancy than to describe. Parents of an innocent child frequently contrived his absence at this time; he would be sent upon some errand, perhaps to catch a pony, and the little fellow would gladly plunge through snow and travel far to be beyond the reach of the rod. If, however, a really guilty child absented himself, the whipping was administered on his return. That many a boy, in his wrath, resolved to thrash the grandchildren of the Pe-wet-ta-te-pats when he grew up to be a man and was himself the whipper, is not to be wondered at. There may have been little philosophizing in the Nez Perce's mode of discipline, but he copied the methods of Nature, and his rules were as indiscriminating as her laws.

The Duke of Wellington at Home.

In Dean Hole's "Memories" ar related several anecdotes of the Duke of Wellington, the first of which shows that he had modesty common among great men, that is unconscious of its own greatness.

He met a lady who was going up the steps to see the model of Waterloo, and remarked to her: "Ah, you're going to see Waterloo. It's very good—I was there, you know."

A bishop was once preaching in the Chapel Royal of St. James, when he was much perplexed by the conduct of the verger, who at the close of the sermon opened the door of the pulpit and suddenly closed it with all his force, so that the noise rang through the building.

"He informed me in a whisper," reports the bishop, "that his Grace the Duke of Wellington was asleep and that, not liking to touch him, they adopted this method of rousing him from his slumbers." This ingenious simulation of a bombardment never failed to stir the old warrior.

Wellington left behind him three memorable sentences. "Education without religion would surround us with clever devils." To a verger who pushed aside a poor man who was going up before him to the altar, with the words, "Make way for his Grace the Duke of Welington," he said, "Not so; we are all equal here." And when a young clergyman was speaking in disparagement of foreign missions, he rebuked him with:

"Sir, you forget your marching orders, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.'"—Youth's Companion.

The Death Watch.

In 1863 I had two chums of the name of Seth and Cicero Dodge, who lived down in the forks of Coon, about four miles below us. The boys were hauling wood to town, and they told me that the woods down in the forks were alive with squirrels, and that if I would go back with them that evening they would get their father to let them have the next day off, and we would have lots of fun. I went home and got my No. 14 muzle loader, plenty of ammunition and my dog, and went home with them. Father Dodge had built a new frame house, but it was not large enough to accommodate the family and any strangers, so Cicero and I slept out in the old log house. I shall never forget the scare we got that night. As boys will, we lay there a long time discussing the various propositions that suggest themselves to two boy chums who haven't seen each other for some time. Along toward midnight we thought we discovered the prseence of somebody under our bed. To make it more certain, we distinctly heard the ticking of his watch. We became uneasy, for the ticking of that watch was regular and incessant. At last Cicero quietly slipped out of bed, went over to the new house and called his father, who came and investigated. Much to our chagrin, the old gentleman soon discovered that the cause of our dread forebodings was only a death watch bug at work in an old log by the side of the bed.—Forest and Stream.

The Cake Walk.

The cake walk proper had its origin among the French negroes of Louisiana more than a century ago. There is little doubt that it is an offshoot of some of the old French country dances. It resembles several of them in form. From New Orleans it spread over the entire south and thence to the north. It was found of convenience to the plantation negroes. They were not wedded by license, and it was seldom that the services of a preacher was called in. At a cake walk a man might legitimately show his preference for a woman and thus publicly claim her for wife. In effect the cake walk was not different from the old Scotch marriage, which required only public acknowledgment from the contracting parties. So this festival became in some sense a wooing, an acceptance or rejection and a ceremony. This explains its popularity with the blacks, outside of its beauties, with the accompaniment of music, which is competent at all times to command negro support. Cake-walking has improved as do most things that are constantly practiced. It has lost its old significance in the South. Negroes now get married, when they marry at all, in white folk's fashion. It has become, however, a pantomimic dance. Properly performed it is a beautiful one. The cake is not much of a prize, though the negro has a sweet tooth.—Chicago Chronicle

"Spent it? What did you do that for?"

A Second Thought.

Some one smelled smoke on the fifth floor of a local hotel the other night and in a minute all was confusion. Guests and employes joined in the search for the fire, but it could not be found and the manager satisfied himself that it was a false alarm. SAFE OPENING AN ART.

An Expert Who Met Many Obstacles and Overcame Them.

Opening refractory vaults, safes and burglar proof chests is a science in itself and is surrounded by the utmost secrecy by those who make a living out of it. In a talk to the Chicago Post a man who has been in the business 40 years said: "The essential qualification which a successful safe opener must possess is an intimate and instinctive knowledge of the mechanism and workings of every variety of combination lock. He must be born to the profession and possess acute mechanical perception.

"Nearly every obstinate safe which I am called upon to open presents unique conditions demanding new and individual treatment. The nature of the difficulty must be correctly diagnosed in advance or the lock will remain obdurate, for machinery does not move by chance.

"The biggest bait ever held out to me came in the form of a proposal from a detective with whom I was well acquainted. It had been supposed that the locks made by a certain firm of safe manufacturers were proof against the manipulations of burglars and experts, but a few days before I was approached by the detective I had been called upon to open one of these safes and had succeeded. The incident gave rise to much comment.

"As I was sitting alone in my office the detective entered and asked me if I did not wish to make some money. I replied that I was in business for just that purpose. He then questioned me closely as to my ability to open the particular kind of lock in question. When satisfied that I was easily able to do so, he said:

"'I'll tell you how you can grab off $100,000 without the least trouble. The boys know where there is a safe of this kind which contains $200,000 in paper currency. It is easy to get at, and all you'll have to do is to walk in, after they have opened the way, unlock the safe, take out $100,000 and leave the remainder for them. It's the easiest kind of money.'

"By 'the boys' the detectve meant a notorious gang of burglars which had been conducting a series of daring operations. I told the detective that I had been much given to card playing in my youth, thus acquiring a strong preference for a lone hand, and that this predilection had become too firmly fixed to be changed. He took the hint and left my office as soon as possible."

SEWING ON MEN-OF-WAR.

How a Sailor May Add Something to His Pay From Uncle Sam.

Visitors on board war vessels in the navy yard will very likely see among the sailors scattered about the decks smoking, talking and so on a sailor at work with a sewing machine. It is a hand machine and has a pretty heavy base, so that it can be set down on deck and worked easily without shifting its position.

The machine is owned by the man working it. On a big ship like, for example, the battleship Indiana, carrying a crew of 400 men or more, there would probably be found as many as a dozen sewing machines. On a third rate cruiser, a smaller vessel, such, for illustration, as the Detroit, there would be apt to be four or five sewing machines. The machines are oftenest owned by sailmakers and sailmakers' mates, but they may be owned by sailors. Any man on the ship might have a sewing machine if he wanted to. Space is valuable on a vessel, and so only hand machines are allowed, and to bring a machine aboard permission must be got from the commanding officer. It is not to be supposed that every man in the ship would want a sewing machine. As a matter of fact comparatively few men do, and those who want to take one aboard are not likely to find any difficulty in the way.

A sailor who has a sewing machine makes and repairs garments for himself and he does work for others for pay. There are not so many sewing machines on the vessels of the new navy as there were on those of the old. The sailor nowadays makes up less of his own outfit than he formerly did. He draws more completed articles from the government, but there is still plenty of work to be done aboard ship with sewing machines, and some money to be made with them yet.—New York Sun.

THE BLUES.

This is a synonym for that gloomy, harrassed condition of the mind which has its origin in dyspepsia. All the ugly spirits that, under the name of the "blues," "blue devils," "megrims" and "mulligrubs" torment the dyspeptic almost ceaselessly, vanish when attacked with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, that, moreover, annihilates biliousness, constipation, chills and fever, kidney complaints and nervousness.

A GOOD THING FOR WOMEN TO REMEMBER.

That in addressing Mrs. Pinkham they are communicating with a woman—a woman whose experience in treating woman's ills is greater than that of any living physician—male or female.

A woman can talk freely to a woman when it is revolting to relate her private troubles to a man—besides, a man does not understand—simply because he is a man.

Many women suffer in silence and drift along from bad to worse, knowing full well that they should have immediate assistance, but a natural modesty impels them to shrink from exposing themselves to the questions and probable examinations of even their family physician. It is unnecessary. Without money or price you can consult a woman, whose knowledge from actual experience is greater than any local physician living.

The following invitation is freely offered; accept it in the same spirit.

Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to freely communicate with Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read and answered by women only, thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America which has never been broken and has induced more than 100,000 sufferers to write her for advice during the last four months. Out of the vast volume of experience which she has to draw from, it is more than possible that she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case. She asks nothing in return except your good will, and her advice has relieved thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.—Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass.

What Neglect Leads To.

Mrs. Chas. King's Experience.

A woman's body is the repository of the most delicate mechanism, and yet most women will let it get out of order just as if it were of no consequence. Their backsache, heads throb and burn; they have wandering pains, now here and now there; experience extreme lassitude, that don't-care and want-to-be-left-alone feeling, excitability, irritability, nervousness, sleeplessness, and the blues, yet do nothing to help themselves. These indicate womb complications.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will relieve all this trouble.

MRS. CHAS. KING, 1815 Rosewood St., Philadelphia, Pa., says:—

"I had bearing-down feelings, backache, burning sensation in my stomach, chills, headache, and always had black specks before my eyes. I sometimes had four and five fainting spells a day. I had several doctors, and tried many patent medicines. I commenced to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I never had anything give me the relief that it has. I can truthfully say it has cured me."

TENDERNESS.

Not unto every heart is God's good gift
Of simple tenderness allowed; we meet
With love in many fashions when we lift
First to our lips life's waters, bitter-sweet.
Love comes upon us with resistless power
Of curbless passion, and with head-strong will;
It plays around like April's breeze and shower,
Or calmly flows, a rapid stream, and still
It comes with blessedness unto the heart
That welcomes it aright, or—bitter fate!—
It wrings the bosom with so fierce a smart,
That love, we cry, is crueler than hate.
And then, ah me! When love has ceased to bless,
Our broken hearts cry out for tenderness!

We long for tenderness like that which hung
About us, lying on our mother's breast;
A selfish feeling, that no pen or tongue
Can praise aright, since silence sings it best;
A love, as far removed from passion's heat
As from the chillness of its dying fire;
A love to lean on when the falling feet
Begin to totter, and the eyes to tire.
In youth's bright hey-day hottest love we seek,
The reddest rose we grasp—but when it dies,
God grant that later blossoms, violets meek,
May spring for us beneath life's autumn skies;
God grant some loving one be near to bless
Our weary way with simple tenderness!

WITHOUT DUE AUTHORITY.

He stood at the street corner, looking drearily into the growing fog.

A minute or two before he had been standing behind the railings in the park, absorbed in an effort, altogether unavailing, to save the souls of his fellow citizens in this metropolis of evils. A few yards away a revolutionary bricklayer—out of work and with the strongest private objection to being in it—had hurled denunciations at the iniquitous British constitution, to the delight of himself and the amusement of his audience, and of a couple of placidly smiling policemen who stood near in that impersonal yet protective attitude characteristic of the force. A little farther on, a "lightning artist" of tender years furnished a quiet antidote to gesticulatory anarchy by the reproduction on paper of "the "Duke of York's baby," to a chorus of loyal applause. On the preacher's other hand, a martyr, whose motives his country had ignorantly misunderstood, perhaps, not without just occasion, had related with some feeling much abuse of authorities, and more of that luckless eighth letter of the alphabet, which is the chosen victim of eloquence in fustian, the melancholy details of an enforced retreat from public life, which, to judge from appearances, he had very richly deserved. When the preacher's audience tired of his discourse, they had only to turn their heads to imbibe incipient anarchy and dejected patriotism, or cultivate a healthy admiration for juvenile talent and the reigning house—a combination of conflicting sentiments peculiar to Hyde Park on a Sunday afternoon.

The other orators, however, had found compensation for their wrongs in the delight of airing them at large. They retired from the field of battle hoarse, but triumphant. The preacher's triumph was a question which he could only regard as much more dubious. In moments of despair, which sometimes fell to his lot, he knew that his congregation merely regarded him as an interlude between the denunciations of the political bricklayer and the dismal rhetoric of the ex-thief. But, to do him justice, those moments were few and far between. He had fought a hard battle from a very early age, and defeat had ceased to depress him save at odd times when he was, perhaps, a little colder, hungrier or sadder than it was his usual fate to be.

As he stood at the corner a hand was laid on his shoulder, and he turned to find himself face to face with Dr. Jeff. They had met before, in slums and byways, and each man knew enough of the other's life to respect it. I cannot assert that Jeff is the little doctor's real name, and perhaps he has a story or mystery, or both—a skeleton which he hides in the cupboard at his shabby lodgings, with the stale bread and highly unprofessional cheese which that receptacle contains—but I am sure that there is no kinder soul in all London, despite his snarls, his sarcasms and the inexpressibly unorthodox opinions which he scatters broadcast in this way. All men have their hypocrisies, and he has his. It is his delight to shock people, to pose as something very little better than the archfiend himself. I have seen him succeed admirably in his deception—with strangers. Those who know the good little man know also that he would not willingly bruise a butterfly's wing nor offend the dirtiest and most melodious tabby that serenades his hard-earned slumbers. Even now, as the preached turned his white face and tired eyes upon him and forced a smile, there was a charitable scheme brewing in Jeff's mind.

"Finished spouting?" he asked, gruffly. "Walk my way, will you? Abominable weather!"

He spoke with a savage air, as though the weather and he were on terms of violent hostility. Jeff's manner generally suggested the feud-brief and stiletto and other pharaphernalia of mediaeval murder.

They walked for some time in silence, during which the doctor eyed his companion with a bloodthirsty expression of countenance.

"Better give it up," he said at last. "Wearing yourself out for nothing. All bosh!"

"Is it?" asked the preacher, half sadly. "Sometimes I—I almost wish my profession allowed me to think so, too, doctor. But it doesn't."

"Hang your profession!" jerked out Jeff. "You're not a parson?"

"No."

"Ever been one?"

"No."

"Then, why in the name of common sense don't you go and earn some money? My good fellow, you're——"

"What's the good of preaching?" he went on, changing his sentence. "The world went very well for a great many centuries before you were born; it'll go very well for many more after you're buried. Let it go!"

The preacher's deep eyes flashed.

"I'll never do that," he said, quietly.

They had walked a considerable way, and Jeff looked up with a well-assumed start of surprise.

"Hanged if this isn't my place! Never meant to bring you all this way. Come in and rest."

The preacher hesitated, but he did not wish to give offense and finally they tramped up the narrow stairs to Jeff's sanctum—a little sitting-room with hideous cheap furniture, a flaring paper and a table littered with books. It was all very cheerless, very dingy, but Jeff waved his guest to a chair with a certain dignity foreign to his usual manner—a survival, perhaps, of other ways of life and of other visitants than street preachers. After all, it is the man who makes his surroundings. A parvenu can be vulgar in a palace; our little doctor, despite his bluster, might have been a prince in disguise.

So the preacher thought as he sat down in the arm chair—black horse-hair covered, and deficient in the matter of springs—and glanced round the room at the well-worn books, at the oil-stove, which smelled abominably, at the cupboard where the skeleton clattered its empty jaws among dry crusts and ancient cheese.

"Not much of a place, is it?" said Jeff. "We've known better, both of us. But it does—anything does. Excuse me, but I want my supper. Do you mind my getting it? Coin don't run to many courses. But perhaps you'll help me? Hate solitary meals—always did; bad for the digestion. Pah! how that infernal thing does smell, to be sure!"

Of course the preacher saw through the device, and its clumsy, kindly delicacy touched him as few things had done of late. He murmured some commonplace reply and proceeded to take a tender interest in the retrimming of the stove. I fancy there were tears in his tired eyes as he fumbled with the matches, and that he blessed Jeff's grumpy hospitality with a fervor which would have agreeably astonished the doctor, who had received so little gratitude in his time that he had outgrown the usual habit of expecting it.

He did not look at his guest as he hunted in the cupboard and brought out such modest provision as it contained, and presently the preacher rose and began to set the table ready in silence. As he lifted one of the books something on its faded cover caught his eye. On the brown leather was stamped a coat-of-arms, almost indistinguishable by reason of its antiquity. Jeff saw the glance directed toward him, took the book from his companion's hand and flung it roughly into a corner.

"Somebody's aristocratic vulgarity," he said, shortly. "What do they want to scatter their stupid quarterings about for? I picked it up second-hand."

The preacher went on silently with his task. He was quite aware that the book had not been picked up second-hand, but he did not even look as if he doubted Jeff's statement. Only I think the skeleton sidled a little closer to the cupboard door. It is a thing which all skeletons will do at times.

The two men sat down at the table and began their supper. They did not talk much at first, but presently Jeff pushed back his chair and glanced across at the preacher.

"I told you a lie just now," he said.

The preacher looked up, and the two men's eyes met.

"I know you did," he answered, simply.

"I thought you didn't know. Rather pride myself on telling a lie neatly. Learned it at school—about the only thing I did learn there. Ah, now I've shocked you."

"No," answered the other, sadly. "I—I am not easily shocked."

"New sort of saint, eh? Well, we've had about enough of the old."

There was silence for a moment and then Jeff said:

"How do you know?"

"By the way you flung the book."

"Ah! I saw you looking at the old shield and it hurt. Odd how small things do hurt sometimes. Perhaps you know that, too?"

"I know it very well," murmured the preacher, with his eyes cast down.

"Thought you did," said Jeff, with a little smile which had a touch of irony in it.

The little doctor could never be quite serious—his retrospective melancholy had a dash of amusement in it. He had grown used to the idea of himself and the rest of humanity squirming beneath the dissecting knife of malignant destiny.

"Been preaching about here?" he went on.

The preacher looked up, half nervously.

"No. Why do you ask?"

"Not staying long, are you?"

"No," said the preacher, with a quiet sound in his voice. "No, I think I shall not stay very long."

Jeff sprang to his feet and then sat down again. He looked hard at the man's white face, and it looked back at him. There was no fear in it, and the sad eyes met his steadily.

"You—you must go away," said Jeff.

The preacher smiled a little.

"Yes—where—to the south of France? My dear doctor, that's not for me—at least not now. Once"—he stopped, and his eyes grew dreamy. "Not now," he said again.

Jeff did not speak at once.

"You must leave London, then."

"It is hardly worth while."

"You're a fool, and an enthusiast," said Jeff, roughly, yet with a sharp catch in his voice, "but you're good stuff. I've seen you when—man, you're killing yourself!"

The preacher never winced. The smile still lingered on his lips, though they were set tight.

"I can't run away, doctor," he replied. I never did that, and I can't do it now."

"You weren't meant for this work—do you think I have no eyes? Write to your people and tell them——"

"I have no people," answered the preacher, and his face was very stern.

Jeff tilted his chair, waiting. It came at last. The preacher caught his eye, and hesitated for a moment.

"I told you a lie, then," he said.

"Go on."

"They threw me over. My father is a clergyman. I was to have gone into the church. I wanted to—you don't know how much! But I could not accept everything they told me. I suppose I was unorthodox——" He stopped. Jeff nodded mute encouragement.

"They rejected me," said the preacher slowly.

"Because you were honest. Yes. And this was——"

"The only other way."

"You are a priest, all the same," said Jeff, through his teeth.

The preacher stood up.

"Without due authority," he answered, as he held out his hand.

"Authority," said the little doctor, waspishly, "is not always given to the right man—nor by the right man.'

But the preacher went away silently. He was not one of those who speak evil of authorities.

It was a month or two later, and London was in the grip of black, bitter frost. In a doorway in one of the slums, behind the Salamander Music hall, Jeff, haggard and anxious, stood looking at the preacher with something like despair in his face.

"I'm stone broke," he said, "and the girl must have nourishment or she'll die. There's no time to apply to anyone. Good God! what are we to do?"

He stamped desperately on the floor, and then remembered his patient and stopped. The preacher did not stamp.

"I'll get you some money," he said. "I think I can. Yes"—he shivered a little in the cold draught—"I'm sure I can."

"In an hour?"

"Within an hour. I'll go now."

"You're a brick," said Jeff, as he turned on his heel. Then the professional element in him asserted itself. "Have something to eat before you come out into this cold again, mind," he commanded.

The preacher nodded and went away with a dreary smile on his face. Perhaps there was a hidden irony in the situation which he alone could perceive, for he smiled more than once as he hurried through the darkening streets to the house where he had harborage. Once, as he passed a lighted church where the choir was practicing for the morrow and his eyes fell on the notice board, the smile very nearly became a laugh. Yet there was nothing laughable in sight. The notice board merely bore the sufficiently sober information that Rev. John Allingham Taylor would preach next day in that church.

The preacher hurried on, and climbed to his rooms with a white face and fluttering breath. Arrived there, he sat down on a broken chair and panted. The room was almost as bare as those cells wherein the hermits dwelt of old. All the little personal possessions which had adorned it once had vanished in that dreadful winter. All the little money which had been paid to the preacher by the family which had discarded him was gone. The only two things which remained were a large and handsomely bound bible, lying on the foot of the bed, and a little ivory crucifix hanging against the bare wall. The preacher's eye fell on these and he sighed. Then he got up resolutely, took down the crucifix and opened the bible. On the flyleaf was an inscription. He tore the page carefully out and slipped it into the breast pocket of his thin coat. Then he took up the bible and crucifix and went out.

Not an hour later Jeff, in a wretched attic, bent over a shrunken figure and forced brandy between its lips. At the further end of the room two children—small, starved, wolfish-eyed—sat over the remnants of a meal like wild beasts over a bone. Presently the little doctor gave a muttered exclamation of relief. The children glanced up and then returned ravenously to their food. Their mother's eyes opened for a moment upon Jeff's face, and she whispered a word of thanks. And well she might, for he had dragged her out of the jaws of death.

Meanwhile the preacher plodded wearily back again to the shelter of the four bare walls he called home. He did not hurry this time. Very slowly he climbed the creaking stairs, and almost staggered into the room. It was growing dark and the cold was intense. The preacher sat down and his eyes involuntarily sought the nail where the little crucifix had hung. Involuntarily, too, his hand drew out the page which he had torn from the bible. He bent over it and read the inscription—was it the twilight which made the letters dance and sway? It was very cold and the darkness seemed to come closer every moment. Perhaps it was only his weakness that made it seem so dark and freezing. He thought of Jeff and his work with a curious gladness that shut out the falling night. Then a great weariness seized him and he rose and tried to cross the room. The darkness was whirling round him now and he fell on his knees beside the bed.

* * * * * * *

Jeff, coming in late that night to tell him of his success, found him there kneeling beneath the nail where the crucifix had hung. He did not answer when the little doctor called to him, and a lighted match revealed the fact that he had slipped from a world which had rejected him as a man of no account. The bare room told a silent story that brought tears into Jeff's eyes.

And in the dead preacher's hand was a piece of crumpled paper, upon which was written "John Allingham Taylor" and a date—that was all.

* * * * * * *

In a certain church on the following morning, Rev. John Allingham Taylor preached, to the great edification of his audience and himself. It was a charity sermon, and it is popularly supposed to have been the finest thing which that congregation had sat out for some time.

But Jeff, who occasionally attended that assembly, rose in the middle of the discourse and went out with a heart full of bitterness. Those studied periods did not edify him. He remembered a finer sermon—and its text was a man's life. It was that of the priest who had preached without due authority.—Belgravia.

A Spelling-bee.

"I'm going to have a spelling bee to-night," said Uncle John, "and I'll give a pair of skates to the boy who can best spell 'man.'" The children turned and stared into one another's eyes. "Best spell 'man,' Uncle John? Why, there is only one way!" they cried. "There are all sorts of ways," replied Uncle John. "I leave you to think of it a while." And he buttoned up his coat and went away.

Time went slowly to the puzzled boys for all their fun that day. It seemed as if that after supper time would never come; but it came at last, and Uncle John came, too, with a shiny skate-runner peeping out of his great-coat pocket. Uncle John did not delay. He sat down, and looked straight into Harry's eyes. "Been a good boy to-day, Hal?"

"Yes—no," said Harry, flushing. "I did something Aunt Mag told me not to do, because Ned Barnes dared me to. I can't bear a boy to dare me. What's that to do with spelling 'man'?" he added, half to himself.

But Uncle John turned to Bob. "Had a good day, my boy?"

"Haven't had fun enough," answered Bob, stoutly. "It's all Jo's fault, too. We boys wanted the pond to ourselves for one day; and we made up our minds that, when the girls came, we'd clear them off. But Jo, he——"

"I think this is Jo's to tell," interrupted Uncle John. "How was it, boy?"

"Why," said Jo, "I thought the girls had as much right on the pond as the boys. So I spoke to one or two of the bigger boys, and they thought so, too; and we stopped it all. I thought it was mean to treat girls that way." There came a flash from Uncle John's pocket. The next minute the skates were on Jo's knee.

"The spelling match is over," said Uncle John, "and Jo has won the prize." Three bewildered faces mutely questioned him. "Boys," he answered gravely, "we've been spelling 'man,' not in letters, but in acts. I told you there were different ways, and we've proved it here to-night. Think over it, boys, and see."

Not Impressed.

President Kruger of the Transvaal is a man not easily impressed by rank, title, or worldly splendor of any kind, and not in the least ashamed of his own plain origin and rough upbringing. Sir James Sivewright, upon whom once devolved the duty of taking an important and rather pompous English duke to call upon the President, told an American about the conversation which ensued. It was, of course, carried on through an interpreter, and ran about like this:

Duke—Tell the President that I am the Duke of ——, and have come to pay my respects to him.

Kruger gives a grunt, signifying the welcome.

Duke (after a long pause)—Ah! tell him that I am a member of the English Parliament.

Kruger gives another grunt and puffs his pipe.

Duke (after a still longer pause)—And—you might tell him that I am—er—a member of the House of Lords—a lord—you know.

Kruger puffs as before, and nods his head, with another grunt.

Duke (after a still more awkward pause, during which his grace appears to have entertained doubts as to whether he had as yet been sufficiently identified)—Er—it might interest the President to know that I was a viceroy.

Kruger—Eh! What's that—a viceroy?

Duke—Oh, a viceroy—that is a sort of a king, you know.

Kruger continued puffing in silence for some moments, obviously weary of this form of conversation. Then, turning to the interpreter, he said, gruffly: "Tell the Englishman that I was a cattle-herder."

This closed the interview.

Penalty for Desertion.

Desertion in time of war is punishable, in all armies, by death, usually inflicted by shooting. In time of peace it is regarded by various governments with different degrees of severity, according as the military system is mild or severe. In France, Germany or Russia desertion, even in time of peace, is very harshly punished, but in the United States it is punishable by a term of imprisonment at hard labor. As a matter of fact this penalty is rarely inflicted. The desertions in our army number from 1,000 to 1,200 annually, and few of the runaways are ever caught.

OUR SUNDAY SERMONS

A FEW SUBJECTS FOR ALL TO PONDER OVER.

Words of Wisdom, and Thoughts Worth Pondering Upon Spiritual and Moral Subjects—Gathered from the Religious and Secular Press.

A Remarkable Gathering.

THE largest religious crowd ever seen in the Old Orchard (Me.) camp ground attended a recent meeting of the Christian Alliance, under the leadership of Rev. Dr. A. B. Simpson, of New York. There were 12,000 persons present at the morning service and nearly as many in the afternoon.

More cash pledges for foreign missions were secured than a year ago, but the aggregate was not as large, the $25,000 worth of real estate and an equal amount of bonds making last year's collection of $100,000 a record which could not be reached Sunday. The sum of $20,000 was reached at the forenoon meeting and $45,000 more in the afternoon, making an aggregate of $65,000. Many rings and gold watches were included in the gifts.

There were many interesting incidents connected with the donations. The announcement of a pledge of $2,000 from the Young Women's Alliance was received with shouts and applause. A pledge of $600, another of $250 for India and one of $750 were announced in succession. Then small pledges came in so fast that the counters called for a breathing spell. A pledge of $500 and two of $250 each came in next, and Dr. Simpson asked the choir to sing "Here Is a Ring, Thank God," and Dr. Simpson handed over to Miss Shepard, the Alliance custodian of gifts of jewelry, an elegant gift from a woman enthusiast. Donations of nine other rings and $100 followed in rapid succession.

"Here is a woman who contributes $250, a gold watch and a lot of precious jewelry," announced Dr. Simpson. "Blessed Be His Name," sang the choir, and the audience joined in the singing. Another gift of $1,000 was collected, and a pledge of $300 for Africa.

"I think you are all going to give," said Dr. Simpson; "but let's sing another hymn and get a chance to gather up these pledges." After the hymn had been sung he said:

"We have received an unusually large number of donations thus far. Let them continue. Contribute something that you may spend for car fares. Sacrifice a little on ice cream; you will be better off for it. Stint yourselves on flowers and give to the Lord. If you have any superfluous jewelry send that up, too."

Miss Shepard advanced to the front of the platform to tell the story of a poor woman who had just handed her $5 to be added to the fund.

"She told me," said Miss Shepard, "that she is dependent on a little pension, but she wanted to give the $5 to God's cause. When she took out the $5 bill I saw that she had only $1 left in her pocketbook. These are the kind of sacrifices that count for God's blessing."

"Hallelujah! Lord to Him again!" shouted a blind man, as a pledge for $350 was handed up to the stand. Another ring was passed up, and a woman on the platform pulled off her only remaining ring and handed it to the jewelry custodian.

"I have no money to give, but my darling boy has stood up and testified to his willingness to enter the foreign missionary work. Lord accept him for Thy name's sake." This was written on a card that was handed up to the platform, and its reading called forth many a shout of praise. One more pledge of $300 was announced, and then a basket collection was taken.

Homes Without God.

One alarming evil of the present generation is the number of irreligious homes found in every community. Not homes without culture, refinement, and elegance; not homes wanting in social and worldly enjoyment; but irreligious homes—homes in which practically there is no prayer, no God, no Bible reading, no worship. Practically, God is as much excluded from many homes as he is from the marts of trade or the ball-room. Alas, for such homes! the fathers unsaved, bearing no testimony for Christ, placing before the children no Christian example. Sometimes both parents are unconverted and as indifferent to the gospel or to a word like this as are the most blasphemous infidels. Oh, what a calamity is this! If parents are irreligious, and can dispense with God and his church, how are we to expect better of the children? Godly homes have done more for the peace of society and spread of the gospel throughout the world than any other single agency. If this be true, who can speak the dreadful influence and results of irreligious homes! Many of them are excellent in many things, but wholly unchristian. God have mercy on them.—Our Young People.

The True Faith.

I deem his faith the best
Who daily puts it into loving deeds
Done for the poor, the sorrowing, the oppressed—
For these are more than creeds;
And, though overblinded reason oft may err,
The heart that loves is faith's interpreter.

The schoolman's subtle skill
Wearies itself with vain philosophies
That leave the world to grope in darkness still,
Haply, from lies to lies;
But whoso doeth good with heart and might
Dwells in, and is made joyful by, the light.

One hand outstretched to man
In helpfulness, the other cling to God;
And thus upheld he walks through time's brief span
In ways that Jesus trod;
Taught by His Spirit, and sustained and led,
That life, like His, by love is perfected.

Such faith, such love are thine!
Creeds may be false—at best, misunderstood;
But who so reads the autograph divine
Of Goodness doing good
Need never err therein; come life, come death,
It copies His—the Christ of Nazareth!
—William H. Burleigh.

As a Little Child.

God knows me better than I know myself. He knows my weaknesses—what I can do, and what I cannot do. So I desire to be led, to follow Him; and I am quite sure that He will thus enable me to do a great deal more in ways which seem to me almost a waste in life, advancing His cause, than I could in any other way. I am sure of that. Intellectually I am weak; in scholarship nothing; in a thousand things a baby. He knows this and so He has led me and greatly blessed me, who am nobody, to be of some use to my church and fellow-men. How kind, how good, how compassionate art Thou, oh, God! Oh, my Father, keep me humble! Help me to have respect toward my fellow-men, to recognize these several gifts from Thee. Deliver me from the diabolical sins of malice, envy or jealousy, and give me a hearty joy in my brother's good.—Norman Macleod.

Elevation of the Soul.

What is the elevation of the soul? A prompt, delicate, certain feeling for all that is beautiful, all that is grand; a quick resolution to do the greatest good by the smallest means; a great benevolence joined to a great strength and great humility.

Football is now illegal in Georgia, but the lovers of these exhibitions of physical strength and endurance are permitted to enjoy the somewhat less exciting attractions of the prize fight.

St. Louis had double the number of attendants at its horse show that were noticeable at Chicago's similar entertainment. Chicago's only hope of distancing her rival on the river is to get up a hog show.

Artificial milk is the latest product by a Chicago genius. It is said that nobody can distinguish it from the genuine article. The average dairyman, however, will probably still pin his faith to that hitherto unequaled combination, the cow and the pump.

An exchange says that a notice was recently published that in case a stolen buggywhip was not returned to a certain place before its next issue it would publish the name of the thief. The place designated was a certain backyard. The next morning after the notice came out, the night having been dark, seventeen whips were picked up in said backyard. And yet there are people who do not believe in advertising.

A new mining district has just been formed on the Mojave desert, fifty miles southeast of Mojave, to be called the "Begg Mining District," named after Jonathan Begg, the well-known miner. It occupies a triangular strip of territory about sixteen miles from east to west and twelve from apex to base. The nearest point of railroad is Hesperia. The specific boundaries of the new district are about as follows: It is bounded on the east by the Black Hawk mining district, and on the west by the Ord mining district and the east branch of the Mojave, which finds its headwaters in the mountains of the Holcomb Valley Mining District. The north boundary is the line of the Ord district and the southern boundary is a ridge of mountains sloping toward the Mojave and the north line of the Holcomb Valley District.

A Rival of Klondike.

The Klondike is not the only place on earth where great discoveries of gold have recently been made. It takes a long time to get authentic intelligence from the interior of Siberia, but if half the stories coming from that region can be established as truthful, prospecting parties will soon be outfitting in San Francisco for a voyage to Vladivostok, and a journey from that seaport to the affluents of the Amoor river.

A year ago last summer Russell E. Dunn, a mining engineer of San Francisco, was summoned to Paris by cable to consult with a French syndicate regarding quartz mining in Siberia. It was determined that he should go to the ledges in the far away Siberian territory. He made a journey of 2000 miles by rail over the recently constructed Trans-Siberian Railroad. At Irkutsk he went in a vehicle commonly used in the country and drawn by three horses to a point 2000 miles farther distant on one of the streams flowing from the mountains into the Amoor River. There he found miners delving in the richest of placer mines. Some idea may be formed of the wealth of the region in precious metals when it is considered that gold to the value of $10,000,000 had been taken from one gulch or ravine not over two miles long.

Mr. Dunn ascertained that the Russian methods of mining, while thorough in the way of obtaining all the gold, were old-fashioned, expensive and tedious. In the development of quartz mining little progress had been made, as the German engineers did not seem to understand how to handle the ore.

As a mining region the country differs from Californir, and resembles the upper Yukon districts in this, that no sign of a secondary upheaval of nature is visible. The placer leads show tnat the gold deposits are the result of glacial action without subsequent volcanic disturbance.

Postal Savings Banks.

There is reason to hope that the postal savings bank system will be established in the United States before long. It has been such a complete success in Europe—in Great Britain especially—that it could not fail to be a success here. Though the interest may be lower than the banks give, the absolute security—a national guarantee—brings in a vast amount of deposits. The great advantage of the postal savings bank is that, for this reason, it prevents much hoarding that would otherwise be done. It brings into circulation the gold that would, without it, be hidden in chimneys and under floors and buried in the back garden or worn in belts or sewn in the owner's clothes. How many millions of good money is there held useless no one can guess until postal savings banks brings it out. Then again the postal bank system, by encouraging the deposit of small sums of money and making the deposit or withdrawal very easy, and the places for it very numerous, habits of saving are promoted. We are glad to see that, in his annual report, just made public, Postmaster General Carey lays great stress upon the desirability of the banks. Among other things he says:

"Many millions of dollars are undoubtedly secreted by people who have little or no confidence in ordinary securities and monetary institutions organized by private citizens. It is dead capital, but if its owners could be inspired with absolute confidence in the security of an investment it is altogether probable that the bulk of this fund would find its way into the channels of trade and commerce. If the Government undertook this task the service would undoubtedly be gladly accepted by the people. Their faith in the Government is unbounded. Their little savings, which separately could hardly be put out at interest, would amount in the aggregate to a sum that could be invested to their advantage. It would tend to cultivate thrift in a large class that realizes the advantage of depositing money with the Government instead of wastefully and uselessly expending it, and would tend to bring into closer relationship the Government and its citizens, thus developing practical and enduring patriotism. This growth of patriotic sentiment and good citizenship constitutes a powerful appeal to statesmanship to make a way for these beneficent consequences.

DAYS TO COME.

A long, grim corridor; a sullen bar
Of light athwart the pavement, where no fleet,
Pale sunshine spreads for dark her winding sheet.
A light not born of noon or placid star
Glows lurid through the gloom, while from afar
Beats marching of innumerable feet.
Is this the place where tragic armies meet?
The throb of terror that presages war?
I strain to see; then softly on my sight
There falls the vision, manifold they come—
White, listless day chained to her brother night;
Their hands are shackled and their lips are dumb,
And as they meet the air where each one dies
They turn and smile at me with weary eyes.
—Helen Hay in Century.

INAUGURATION DAY.

When It Will Fall Upon Sundays and What Then Happens.

From the year 1917 to the year 2085 inauguration day will fall on Sunday every 28 years, but in changing from the twentieth century to the twenty first the 40 year period comes in, and after 2085 the next inauguration Sunday will be in 2125. So, there will be a 40 year period from 2181 to 2221 and from 2277 to 2317, but only a 28 year period from 2373 to 2401, as 23 is not divisible by 4.

During any century whose number is divisible by 4 inauguration day falls on Sunday 4 times. During any century whose number is not divisible by 4, it falls on Sunday only 3 times. From 2000 to 2100, for instance, it will fall on Sunday 4 times and also from 2400 to 2500, 20 and 24 being divisible by 4 but from 1900 to 2000, it will fall on Sunday only 3 times, and so from 2100 to 2200, 19 and 21 not being divisible by 4. Observe that, in speaking of the "number of a century" we do not mean the year; 20 is the number of the century—which we divide by 4—and 2000 is the year. Observe, also, that in all this we are not speaking of the recurrence of the date, March 4, but of the particular March 4ths that are inauguration days.

Here is a table showing how many times inauguration day falls on each of the seven days of the week from the year 1800 to the year 3000:

DAYS OF THE WEEK.	1800 to 1899	1900 to 1999	2000 to 2099	2100 to 2199	2200 to 2299	2300 to 2399	2400 to 2499	2500 to 2599	2600 to 2699	2700 to 2799	2800 to 2899	2900 to 2999
Sunday	3	3	4	3	3	3	4	3	3	3	4	3
Monday	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
Tuesday	3	4	3	3	3	4	3	3	3	4	3	3
Wednesday	4	3	4	4	4	3	4	4	4	3	4	4
Thursday	4	4	3	3	4	4	3	3	4	4	3	3
Friday	3	3	4	4	3	3	4	4	3	3	4	4
Saturday	4	4	3	4	4	4	5	4	4	4	3	4

Perhaps it might be well to say that when inauguration day falls on Sunday, the incoming president takes the oath on Saturday, March 3, but is not formally inducted into office until Monday, March 5. This is done to prevent a lapse in the office, for the outgoing president has no authority as such after 12 o'clock, noon, on March 4, whether that date fall on Sunday or on any other day. If, therefore, occasion should arise between noon on Sunday, March 4, and noon on Monday, March 5, for the exercise of the presidential authority, the incoming president, having taken the oath of office, would be qualified to perform the duty. Such a case never has arisen, but it might arise.—Philadelphia Times.

Beecher's Only Poem.

It was related by Mrs. Beecher that during their courtship Mr. Beecher once "dropped into poetry" and wrote a few lines of verse teeming with affection for his sweetheart. But the verses were always kept sacred by Mrs. Beecher, and nothing could win them from her.

One day Mr. and Mrs. Beecher were in the office of Robert Bonner, the publisher.

"Why don't you write a poem, Beecher?" said Mr. Bonner.

"He did once," said Mrs. Beecher.

"Recite it for me, won't you, Mrs. Beecher?"

But the eyes of the great preacher were riveted on his wife, and she knew that he meant silence.

"Come," said Mr. Bonner, "I'll give you $5,000 if you will recite that poem to me," addressing Mrs. Beecher.

"Why, it ran"— quickly said Mrs. Beecher.

"Eunice," simply said Mr. Beecher.

And although Robert Bonner offered to double the sum first offered he never got the poem from Mrs. Beecher. It had been hidden away ever since by Mrs. Beecher and cherished as one of the dearest treasures her husband left her.—Boston Globe.

Man's Most Vulgar Habit.

"If men were compelled to wear skirts for a period, I think they would insist more than they now do that their fellow men should stop the nasty habit of spitting in public," writes Edward W. Bok in The Ladies' Home Journal. "There is no practice of man which is more distressing to women than this disgusting habit. Women constantly complain of it, especially in our larger cities, where sometimes the sidewalks are scarcely fit for them to walk upon. They revolt at the practice, and they are right in so doing, yet year in and year out the habit not only continues but increases, and the protection of cleanliness, to which every woman walking upon our streets has a perfect right, is denied her."

Incandescent lamps increase in effectiveness during the first 80 or 100 hours of use, after which they slowly fade.

Football Legislation.

The announcement of the Chancellor of the State University of Georgia that no more football playing will be allowed in that institution has caused much comment throughout the Eastern States. The cause of it was the death of a student of that University while playing the game. The Ceorgia Legislature has emphasized it by passing a law prohibiting football, and the attentiont attracted to it has resulted in the principal of the Milwaukee High School issuing a similar order. It seems that during a recent football match among members of that school several suffered serious injuries.

Charles Quarles, president of the Milwaukee School Board, is out in a letter in which he advocates the prohibition of football throughout Wisconsin. He says that boys are sent to school for menta training, and not for the purpose of play ing games which have a "hospital list" as an invariable accompaniment to them. He thinks that when the school authorities coutenance and encourage dangerous sports they are recreant to their tusts.

President Harper of the University of Chicago has announced that whenever a member of its football team is caught "slugging" or engaging in any personal violence not sanctioned by the rules of the game, he will be dropped from the team and the University at the same time.

But it must not be said that football must be prohibited because of all who play it one or two lose their tempers or because accidents happen. Players are injured at baseball, contestants get thrown in bicycle races, boys are hurt at race tracks, men recive wounds at cricket, yachting has its casualties, nandball, polo, hammer throwtng—all have their hospital attachments; but no laws are made to stop these sports.

The fact is, football is for big, strong, healthy, well-developed young men, and the weaklings should get no nearer the game than the side lines or the grand stand. The discussion of the game will result in the elimination of some of its rougher features; that is all anyone can ask.

By Rail to Rands burg.

Ramish & Marsh of this city, who have the contract for building the railroad from Kramer to Randsburg, resumed work yesterday, after a few day's delay occasioned by the non-arrival of material. Said Mr. Marsh yesterday: "We have two hundred men at work and expect to complete our contract so that regular train service may be inaugurated by Dec. 5th. At present about twenty-three miles have been graded, and sixteen miles of track laid. The material being used is very heavy and first-class, which would indicate that the projectors, who, by the way, are wealthy gentlemen of New York City, contemplate extending the road and sometime connecting with the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley road at Bakersfield or D. O. Mills' narrow-gauge line, which terminates at Keeler, Inyo county. An extension could be built to connect with either of these roads with much less expense than many would suppose. To connect with the latter road would probably be more advantageous, as the old Salt Lake road survey could be used. I believe that the Randsburg road will be connected with one of the northern lines inside of a year." —Los Angeles Times.

A dispatch from Redwood city says that Thomas Bassett left there some two months ago for the Mojave desert in the interest of local capitalists, who have mining property in San Bernardino county. Bassett returned Thursday and reports the discovery of a turquoise mine of great richness. He brought sixty pounds of the mineral with him, which of itself is worth a snug fortune, as it is valued at from $4 to $8 a carat. Turquoise is a mineral hitherto found only in the Province of Khorassan, Persia, and much prized as an ornamental stone. The young mining engineer will not disclose the location of the mine, but from what he says it is somewhere in the southern part of San Bernardino county. This is the only mine of its kind ever found in the United States, and if it turns out as rich as its owner claims it is, California will be largely benefitted.

This is the way Father Hines, a Catholic priest of Manifee, Michigan, eulogizes the late but unlamented Geo M. Pullman: "His life was spent in oppressing the poor, in robbing labor of its just dues, in sucking out their life blood, and in plundering the city of Chicago. The news of his death will bring no tears to the eyes nor regret to the hearts of the toiling masses. They will rather heave a sigh of relief to know that a great tyrant and an enemy of labor is gone, and cannot longer oppress them. His so-called model town of Pullman was a disgrace to civilization. There liberty was dead. It was the Siberia of America, a hellhole of oppression, iniquity and cruelty.

ROBBERY

Stage Held Up and Express Box Stolen.

"Throw Out the Box," he said, and the Driver Obeyed.

Got Quite a Swag.

On Wednesday evening Rhine's team carrying Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, was held up at a point about one mile from town, where the depot road makes a turn at the southwest corner of Robinson's ranch. The night was quite dark, and Crom. Harper, who was driving, was startled by seeing a dusky figure suddenly spring to his horses' heads from the roadside, followed by the demand, "Throw out the box." Harper thought it was a joke and started to drive on, when the lone bandit fired a shot in the air and again peremptorily demanded that the box be thrown out. Harper threw it out. The robber then ordered him to turn around and return to the depot. Harper drove back about a quarter of a mile and then turned again and came to town and announced what had happened. Under Sheriff Willis at once wired to Sheriff Given at Bishop what had happened, and while this was being done two men on horseback rode rapidly south of town, making a circle clear around and searching the old race track buildings, returning to the place where the hold-up was made. Another party with a lantern came down and an examination showed the imprint of the box in the sand, where it had been thrown out. A further search and the box was found by the roadside, a hole cut in the top and splintered. A box of shoes, an envelope or two and the way packet was all that was left, and the box was brought to town. Under Sheriff Willis and another made a thorough search for tracks to the south, and it is certain that the robber did not go that way and was on foot. It is a well-known fact that considerable sums of money are carried by Wells, Fargo & Co., at this time of the year, it being sent in to pay taxes with. We cannot ascertain the exact amount stolen, but it is estimated at about two thousand dollars. There was seven hundred dollars of county money sent from Bishop. It is thought that the robber has laid in wait at this point for several trips to the depot, and it happened that previous to Wednesday evening they were all bunched at the point of the robbery with the express team in the middle. When the robbery occurred all the other teams had passed and Harper was alone on the express wagon. His brother, driving the mail stage, passed about five minutes ahead of him. When Mairs' stage passed the driver noticed that his team seemed considerably frightened, and he and other drivers noticed the same thing on the previous Monday evening.

Harper says the highwayman was a man of middle height. He could not see his face, but his voice sounded as though it came through an obstruction of some kind. Beyond this there is no clue whatever. Wells, Fargo & Co. will no doubt send on a detective in a day or two.

At Mazourka.

Henry Giles, Harry Cook, M. Laprairie and George Thorpe have commenced operations on their group of gravel mines in Mazourka canyon. They will run a drain tunnel about 1600 feet long to bedrock, and will utilize the water obtained for sluicing. They have got out the necessary timbers and have them on the ground and are now at work on a cabin. They will make a good substantial tunnel, and do all their work in an enduring manner. Roeper & Mulholland have a force of men at work sinking a shaft to bedrock on the extreme upper end of the Mazourka group, and should they find gold in paying quantities a valuable mining enterprise will be opened up.

The three-year-old boy of J. A. John son of Lynn Center, Ill., is subject to attacks of croup. Mr. Johnson says he is satisfied that the timely use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, during a severe attack, saved his little boy's life. He is in the drug business, a member of the firm of Johnson Bros. of that place; and they handle a great many patent medicines for throat and lung diseases. He had all these to chose from, and skilled physicians ready to respond to his call, but selected this remedy for use in his own family at a time when his child's life was in danger, because he knew it to be superior to any other, and famous the country over for its cures of croup. Mr. Johnson says this is the best selling cough medicine they handle, and that it gives splendid satisfaction in all cases. Sold by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Wedding at Lone Pine

On Thursday, Nov. 25, Benjamin F. Totten was married to Alice L. Harvey, at the residence of the bride's parents at Lone Pine, Rev. Thos. H. Nicholas officiating. Only a few friends attended the wedding. A large number of presents were received. A reception was given in the afternoon, when numerous friends of the happy couple came to concongratulate them and to wish them happiness and prosperity.

Mr. Carroll was present with his camera and took photographs of the couple, then of the whole family.

Randsburg Notes.

Correspondence Los Angeles Times:—The double compartment shaft of the St. Elmo mine is now down 200 feet, and at that depth they have a sixteen-foot vein of ore. They are running only a daylight shift. On the foot wall they have a tough whitish colored vein of talc, varying in thickness from a few inches to a foot. A great deal of assessment work is now being done in that vicinity.

Dean & Brand, who own the little cyanide plant at Koehn Springs, shipped a gold brick worth $2000 to San Francisco a few days ago. This is the fifth shipment of about equal amount since July, when the plant was put in operation. The millmen bought 2000 tons of the tailings from the Koehn Springs mill, put up their plani, and have been buietly operating it ever since, employing four men. They formerly operated the same plant in the Slate range, beyond Borax Lake, on the road to Panamint.

A good strike was made in the northeast drift on the 100 foot level of the Minnehaha a few days ago, when a three-foot vein of rich ore was encountered that is now being sacked for shipment.—Miner.

Judge A. V. Davidson, Independence, Inyo Co., Cal.

DEAR SIR:- The Randsburg Railway will be completed and ready for business on Dec. 1. I have been giving some attention to the country north of Randsburg up as far as Panamint and over in your country with the view of finding out its resources and the enterprises in existence, and to learn what encouragement they need that the Randsburg road can give to stimulate them into greater activity and make business for the road, and to that end I would be glad, if agreeable to you, to have some information in regard to the borax industry, in which I understand you are engaged. Later on I hope to take a trip up into that part of the country, and I hope to have the pleasure of meeting you. If you can spare the time to write to me on the subject matter of this letter I will appreciate it. Yours very respectfully,

ALBERT SMITH
Vice-President Randsburg Railway Co.

Bakersfield Echo: W. D. Young returned yesterday morning from a trip out on the desert, where he had gone in company with a Call artist and Judge Wells as guide, in search of a deserted city. His trip was successful and yesterday morning's Call contained a long report of the expedition and the discoveries made. The party left Mojave Friday and spent five days exploring the mountains northwest of Garlock. On top of Black mountain, one of the tallest and most rugged peaks of the range, their search was rewarded by the sight of the long deserted homes of a race of sun worshipers, whose writings on the walls leave no doubts about their kinship with the races of mysterious people who ages ago lived in the great southwest."

GONE GLIMMERING.

One ripe summer, fresh and fair, has gone glimmering. What with rain and breeze and fair sun, the harvest has left us grain enough to feed the world, and hard times are broken by a kindly hand. But autumn changes come, and we cannot be too self-content not to guard against what autumn brings. It is the changeful temperature of midday warmth and night and morning chill, from the dampness of dews or vapors cast adrift on eastern winds. With the breath of such comes back to very many old-time physical troubles of pains and aches, rheumatism, neuralgia, soreness and stiffness. This is a crop not spoken of in a farmer's almanac, but it must be cared for, else it will lay waste and grow misery. St. Jacobs Oil is a reaper and binder; it reaps the field of pain and binds up and cures. There is no bodily pain it won't relieve, and to the whole group of rheumatic pains, it is a certain and specific cure. Let not the bounties that have been reaped be marred by misery and pain. St. Jacobs Oil is the helper to enjoy the better times.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. Mother Goose.

The most popular children's book ever written was "Mother Goose's Melodies." Mrs. Goose, or "Mother Goose," as she was familiarly called, was the mother-in-law of Thomas Fleet, a Boston printer, early in the last century. When his first child was born, his mother-in-law devoted all her attention to the baby, and, it is said, greatly annoyed Fleet by her persistent and not particularly musical chanting of the old English ditties she had heard in her childhood. The idea occurred to Fleet of writing down these songs and publishing them in book form. The oldest extant copy bears the date of 1719. The price marked on the title page was "two coppers." This account of the origin of "Mother Goose" is discredited by some critics, who declare that in 1697 Perrault published "Contes de ma Mere l'Oye," or "Stories of Mother Goose." The name "Mother Goose" was familiar in French folk-lore, being used by writers of this literature over a century before the time of Perrault.

The Black Maria.

In Boston's early days a negress named Maria Lee kept a sailors' boarding house near the water front. She was a woman of gigantic size and prodigious strength and was of great assistance to the authorities in keeping the peace. When an unusually troublesome fellow was on the way to the lockup, Black Maria, as Maria Lee was called, would come to the assistance of the policeman, and her services were in such requisition for this purpose that her name was associated with almost every arrest made.

Black Maria often carried a prisoner to the lockup on her shoulder, and when the prison van was instituted for the purpose of carrying prisoners it naturally enough was styled the Black Maria.—Journal of Education.

A Stupid Lady Bountiful.

"I once showed an old lady much given to good works of the Lady Bountiful order how some proteges of hers who were constantly on the verge of starvation might be placed in possession of a small but regular and sufficient income. 'My dear,' she said, 'I don't think it is a good plan. They would get too independent. I like them to come to me when they are in difficulties and ask for what they want.'"—"Rich and Poor," by Mrs. Bosanquet

The Cat and the Mirror.

I had a favorite cat, which came habitually to my bedroom door as soon as persons began to move about the house in the morning and mewed for admittance, scratching to emphasize his request if immediate response were not made.

One morning the idea seized me to place him upon the dressing table while I was dressing. The cat at once saw his reflection in the mirror and began to arch his back and whisk his tail. He twisted and turned himself and began to "spit," as if eager for a contest, and of course his apparent adversary did the same. Then he struck savagely at the mirror, evidently without the desired result. Puzzled, he went behind the glass to investigate, returning thoroughly dissatisfied and eager to get at closer quarters.

With a hearty laugh I drew near and began to stroke him, and in the mirror he now saw his own reflection and mine, with my hand upon his head. It seemed as if the cat took in the situation at once, for he glanced from me to the reflection several times, lost his irritation and settled down to watch the proceedings, every now and then looking into the mirror and back to me. Many a time subsequently he took up his position before the mirror, quietly and naturally regarding his own and my image without the slightest emotion.—Current Literature.

An Unconscious Rebuff.

The Rev. H. R. Haweis, author of "Music and Morals," tells a good story in his book, "Travel and Talk," of an unconscious rebuff he once received in a railway carriage:

An old gentleman who sat opposite had been eying me over his evening paper with what I fancied was a look of recognition. Presently he handed me the paper and pointed to an article on a musical subject. "I thought, sir," he said politely, "you might like to see this article."

One glance was sufficient. I recognized an almost verbatim chapter of "Music and Morals." Disgusted at the fraud, I handed the paper back, remarking that I was quite familiar with the contents. "In fact," I rashly added, "it is a chapter out of 'Music and Morals.' You may know the book?"

"Indeed, sir, I never heard of it. Who is it by?"

"Oh," I said, "a man named Haweis—a parson, you know."

"Oh, really! I never heard of him!"

"Haven't you?" said I.

"No," said he.

"Oh!" said I, and the conversation dropped. So of whomsoever it may be said or sung, "E dun know where 'e are," in the long run "most everybody" finds his level.

Chewing the Betel Nut.

Maxwell Sommerville, in his book "Siam on the Meinam, From the Gulf to Ayuthia," says that, the chewing of the betel nut being a common habit, at every little distance as you go through the bazaar of Bangkok may be seen petty merchants busy making and selling the preparation so universally masticated.

"The leaves in which the prepared mixture is wrapped are from a vine known as the chavica betel. The nut is from the arica betel palm, which reaches a height of about 60 feet, whose branches bear several large bunches of nuts, which harden and redden as they ripen, and which resemble somewhat the bunches of fruit on the date bearing palm. The dealers cut up their green leaves into the proper triangular form, crack the nuts, and with wooden spatulas work the tumeric stained juice into a paste. It is amusing to see how skillfully they form the pieces of green leaf into pointed, cone shaped cups, into each one of which they place a portion of the ingredients."

Oxygen and Mushrooms.

A singular way of removing oxygen from the air by the aid of a plant is described by Dr. T. L. Phipson in The Chemical News. Inside a glass bell jar, suspended over water, is placed a mushroom, and sunlight is allowed to fall upon the plant. The mushroom absorbs the oxygen from the air in the jar, and the carbonic acid formed during the process is absorbed by the water, which gradually rises in the jar to one-fifth of its height. The mushroom now dries up, but its animation is only suspended, as may be proved by introducing beside it a green plant, when it will recommence to vegetate, being nourished by the oxygen exhaled from the fresh plant.

The Huns.

The first mention of the Huns in history is in China, B. C. 210. They conquered that country and were afterward driven out by the Celestials and marched clear across Asia, penetrating the country now known as Hungary in 376 A. D. For a time they threatened to overrun the whole of the continent, but were defeated in the heart of France and driven back to the banks of the Danube.

A NIGHT AT LAS CRUCES.

"FIVE minutes after leaving the house in company with my host, E. A. Van Patten, sheriff of Dona Ana County, came the first exciting experience of the night," said a man from New Mexico in telling of some happenings in that territory when the railroads there were new. "We had crossed an open lot and turned up the sandy street leading to the principal street of Las Cruces when, bang—bang—bang! from somewhere in the darkness ahead came the reports of a repeating-rifle, or heavy revolver, mingled with the whizzing screech of bullets coming straight down the road with us in the direct line of their course. At the first shot Van Patten and I stopped still, and a man walking along at a little distance behind us jumped to the road-side and went flat to the ground in the ditch. He wasn't hit, and didn't mean to be. The second bullet passed between Van Patten and me, the wind of it flapping the sheriff's hat-brim. The third—well, I wasn't there any more, but was making three jumps to the second to get behind the corner of an adobe wall that fenced an orchard from the road. The sheriff stood his ground and laughed at me for running away; then went back to the house for his revolver. When we got up to the main street, we learned that the firing had been done by a Mexican taking shots at another Mexican in a quarrel over a girl. No one was hit, and so the matter passed.

"The city's principal street was ablaze with the lights of saloons, all open in front on this hot September night and crowded with customers. Miners, ranch-men, soldiers, lawyers, tourists, and Spanish-Americans, rich and poor, passed in and out or lounged about the doorways. The sheriff, a candidate for re-election, talked with everybody in English or Spanish, as the occasion demanded, and set up the drinks often for the crowd as we cruised from place to place. At about ten o'clock a messenger with a telegram came hunting for him, and soon a new excitement spread through the town, and men gathered in groups to listen to such details as had reached the city of an attempt at train robbery that had occurred on the Atchison road that night a few miles above Las Cruces. The robbers had tried to ditch the southward-bound passenger train, but had succeeded only in stopping it, and after attacking the express-car, had been beaten off. A mile from the place the same men, it was supposed, had help up a rich ranchman and robbed him of his money, pistol, and watch. Messages had at once been sent by the division superintendent of the road to the sheriffs of Dona Ana, Lincoln, Sierra, and Socorro Counties, notifying them of the occurrence. Two railroad detectives had arrived in Las Cruces on a special locomotive, and were in consultation with Van Patten by eleven o'clock that night.

"Van Patten hunted up all of his deputies that were in town, and sent two with a posse up to the scene of the attempted robbery to trail the bandits from that point. He also set inquiries on foot as to whether certain untrustworthy characters living at Las Cruces were in town at the time the train was stopped. Having done everything apparently that could be done that night toward detecting and capturing the outlaws, Van Patten said to me:

"'Let's go up to Juana's and eat some enchiladas before we go home.'

"We left the main street and its revelries and went up the hill to the east, among the flat-roofed adobe houses of the poorer Mexican residents of the town. As we passed these humble homes, through the doorways left open for coolness the forms of the inmates asleep upon the floor of the one room within could indistinctly be seen. Juana's was a sort of Mexican restaurant, and here, at midnight, we ordered the enchiladas, which were brought to us on a platter by the dark-skinned comely hostess. Enchiladas are tortillas—thin cakes of unleavened bread resembling an ordinary buckwheat cake in size and shape—on which is spread a mixture of onions and red chili peppers chopped up together. With a bottle of beer to accompany them, I found the enchiladas not half bad to eat. As we sat at the table a pretty Mexican girl in a white-muslin gown, and bare-headed, came in, whom the sheriff greeted as Josefa and invited to a glass of beer. They chatted together in the Spanish tongue as we ate our enchiladas, and he joked her about some person whom he called 'Shifty Bill.' Our meal finished, we paid the hostess, said good-night to her and Josefa, and went out into the darkness. We did not go back the way we had come, but, taking another route, passed an adobe house in which a light was burning, while the door was closed.

"'That is Josefa's house,' the sheriff said to me. We walked on as far as the next house, a few steps beyond. Van Patten pulled me into its shadow and stopped.

"'We'll wait here a bit. Don't speak or make a noise,' he cautioned me.

"A minute later I found myself standing alone, the sheriff having left me so silently that I had not noticed his going. As I stood in the shadow, wondering what all this mystery was about, the door of Juana's house, up the hill-side, opened, and the white-robed form of Josefa came through the darkness toward her house. Arriving, she went into the house, leaving the door partly open. Then came the sound of footsteps of some one walking softly toward the house, and in the light that streamed through the doorway I saw a man, in dark clothes and wearing a sombrero, on the point of entering the house.

"His foot was at the threshold when click, came the sound of a pistol-hammer suddenly cocked, and the sheriff's voice said, sternly: 'Hands up! You're my prisoner!'

"The man at the threshold started back as if he had been stung and turned, but his hands went up above his head as quickly when he saw Van Patten, who had stepped behind him from round the corner of the house, covering him with his revolver. He recovered himself in a moment enough to curse vigorously. Van Patten took no chances with his prisoner. Josefa in the doorway was screaming for a rescue and calling for a knife that she might kill the sheriff. She would have attacked him tooth and nail, but he declared that he would shoot the prisoner with the first interference from any one.

"'It's no use, Bill; you'd better come along peaceably,' he said, 'I'll show you my warrant when we get to the calaboose. This gun'll do for warrant till we get there. You know what'll happen if you drop your hands. Right about! March!'

"Down the hill, into the main street of the town, we went, where, at past one o'clock in the morning, the saloons were in full blast, with a trade almost as good as in the beginning of the evening. A crowd gathered and followed as the sheriff took his prisoner to the lock-up. There had been no chance since the arrest was made for the man to get rid of anything he had concealed about him, and there were found in his possession, besides the pair of revolvers and knife at his belt, a black mask and a gold watch and pocket-book with money, which afterward led to his conviction for the crime of attempted train-wrecking and for the robbery of the ranchman. The arrest of Shifty Bill—such was the prisoner's title, his real name being Philip Hulskamp—was followed by the capture of his two accomplices within the next twenty-four hours, so that this episode was quickly closed.

"'I suspected from the first that Shifty Bill had a hand in the business up the road,' said the sheriff, as we walked home together in the early morning. 'Why? Instinct, I suppose. I found out that he had not been in town through the afternoon and evening. When his girl, Josefa, came for enchiladas and frijoles to take to her home—that was her errand at Juana's—I made up my mind that she expected him to arrive late and hungry. Did you see her face when I joked her about Bill? She was anxious for him, and showed it. So when he came to her house I took the risk of arresting him, and I made no mistake.'"—New York Sun.

WEARERS OF WOODEN SHOES.

Not Confined to Foreigners, but Are Used in American Communities.

A wagon load of wooden shoes, such as are worn by European peasants, lay in a heap on the floor of a wooden ware dealer's store down town in New York the other day.

"Who wears 'em?" inquired the writer, as he looked at the stock.

"More people than you would think," was the answer of the dealer, "and not only foreign-born, old-fashioned folks, but quite a number of Americans. Their chief sale is in winter. In fact, there is little or no call for them at any other season. Our customers are mostly dairymen, gardeners, farmers, brewers, dyers and men employed in slaughter houses. Chicken cleaners in the dressed poultry business who stand in feathers and steam wear them to save their shoe leather. Gardeners' wives and daughters wear them about home, and sometimes in the severest weather in the market.

"In cold weather car, truck and cab drivers in New York and other cities wear them for the reason that they are warmer than any other footwear. Some drivers cover them with black cloth, or blacken them, and then tack old rubber or leather bootlegs to the top. Worn thus the thick soles are a great protection against frost, and one's feet are always dry. They are also worn by street cleaners and men who work at paving roads, especially when hot asphalt is used, which is found to be very destructive to leather."

Wooden shoes are now sold by the thousands in New York. Some of them are made in Maine, but most of them come from Holland. They are made of birch, ash and boxwood and sell retail at from 50 cents to $1.25 a pair, according to finish and quality.

English as She Is Writ.

The "classified ads" of a Chicago morning paper recently contained the following, says the Times-Herald:

"Wanted—A second-hand woman's Columbia bicycle, 1895 make."

On the same day a State street house advertised "2,000 damaged ladies' cloth capes at 5c each."

Was the second-hand woman of the morning paper anything like the damaged ladies of the State street store? If not, why not? They would seem to belong to the "same family," as the masquerading nephew in "Olivette" would say.

A Michigan avenue advertiser several weeks ago announced that he had "two imported ladies' handsome Easter jackets cheap." Are these "imported ladies" of the sort that rule our kitchens nowadays?

One of the dry goods houses a few days ago advertised "$3 black figured brilliantine ladies' dress skirts," "$3 checked woolen ladies' dress skirts," and "$6 plaid ladies' dress skirts." Were these figured, checked and plaid ladies similar to the "tatooed ladies" so frequently found in the dime museums a few years ago?

One of the department stores recently advertised "all wool boys' sweaters," "japanned infants' bathtubs" and a "solid oak child's high chair." An all wool boy would certainly need a sweater, and possibly a japanned infant would need a bath quite as much as a flesh and blood one. But, seriously, a "solid oak child" must be tough. If a boy, he is very apt to be a blockhead as well, and if a girl, she would scarcely expect to have a willowy form on growing up to woman's estate.

Another house advertised "five-cent ladies' extra quality ribbed balbriggan sleeveless vests." Well, "five-cent ladies" are just the ones who would wear "vests." The word "vest," when applied to a man's garment, is almost as bad as that other vulgarism, "pants," but applied to a woman's garment it is still more vulgar.

The Healthy Palate.

While a perfectly sound and healthy palate does not crave for condiments, even prefers to do without them, yet the majority of digestions require to be humored and kept in order, and their peculiarities must be studied. Dr. Brunton says: "Savory food causes the digestive juices to be freely secreted; well-cooked and palatable food is therefore more digestible than the unpalatable. If food lacks savor, a desire naturally arises to supply it by condiments not always well selected or wholesome." As commerce brought them within reach of the people, condiments, in simple or complicated forms, came greatly into favor, and foreign spices were added to the wild herbal growths of the fields and hedges. In our early history the "spicery" was a special department of the court, and had its proper officers. In the fourteenth century spices were both costly and rare, most of them coming from the Levant. Chaucer mentions many by name—canella, macys, clowe (cloves), grains of paradise, nutmegs, caraway and spikenard. The ancients, especially the Greeks and Romans in the luxurious period of their history, used condiments very freely. An old English historian, referring to the earlier Roman court, says: "The best magistrates of Rome allowed but the ninth day for the city and publick business; the rest for the country and the sallet garden." From this it would seem as though the education of taste was accounted of some consequence in those days!

Peculiarities of Clever Men.

Macaulay, the historian, always used to eat his Sunday dinner alone and at a restaurant. When he had finished he generally built up a pyramid of wine glasses, which he delighted to see topple over. When he left the restaurant he used to pay liberally for the broken glass as well as for the dinner.

Cowper, the poet, was a great hand for pets. At one time he possessed a squirrel, a cat, two dogs, several canary birds, a starling, a jay, a magpie, two guinea pigs, three hares and five rabbits.

Whenever the soldierly Duke of Epernay saw a hare it made him sick, and once he kept his bed for a week after one of these little animals touched him.—Philadelphia Times.

A Persistent Striker.

"Please," began the emaciated wanderer, "could you give a little aid to a poor striker?"

"I don't call you a very poor striker," said the lady of the house. "This is the third time you have struck me for something to eat within a week."

Whereupon the wanderer struck out.—Typographical Journal.

A View of the Sultan.

Here is a first view of the sultan as Mrs. Max Muller sees him. She describes it in her "Letters From Constantinople:"

"The green enameled and richly gilded barouche comes in sight, drawn by two glorious black horses covered with golden harness, driven by a man in bright blue and gold livery, and on each side the grooms in blue and gold and every man in sight, naval, military, civil, master or servant, in the all pervading but all becoming fez.

"In the carriage sits a small yet stately man, in a simple cloth military overcoat, with no order or decoration of any sort, only his curved sword and a fez like the rest. His large hooked nose proclaims his Armenian mother. His piercing eyes are raised to our window as he passes, but his face is still and immovable, and he salutes no one, though his whole person has a swaying motion, so faint that it may only be caused by the swaying movement of the cariage. Opposite his imperial majesty sits Osman Ghazi, the hero of Plevna, almost his only intimate friend, whom he trusts implicitly."

Sisterly Admiration.

Stop! Women,

And consider that in addressing Mrs. Pinkham you are confiding your private ills to a woman—a woman whose experience in treating woman's diseases is greater than that of any living physician, male or female.

You can talk freely to a woman when it is revolting to relate your private troubles to a man; besides, a man does not understand, simply because he is a man.

MRS. PINKHAM'S STANDING INVITATION.

Women suffering from any form of female weakness are invited to promptly communicate with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read, and answered by women only. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman. Thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America which has never been broken. Out of the vast volume of experience which she has to draw from, it is more than possible that she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case. She asks nothing in return except your good will, and her advice has relieved thousands. Surely any woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.

BERCEUSE.

Out of the little bed into the big bed,
Softly, softly he goes,
But where he would rather lay his head
Baby knows.

By night his bed is on my breast
My baby all blond, all white,
His dainty body lies at rest,
Soft cradled there by night.

Whose is the little bed so white?
'Tis his, my lily, my rose!
And when too quickly flees the night
Into it he goes.

Out of the big bed into the little bed,
Softly, softly he goes,
But where she would rather have his head
Mother knows!
—Waverley Magazine.

HOW HE WON HER.

The poor tutor was alone with her; and though it was in the days when men fought hard battles even against their own kinsmen, if they so thought it was for the right, his heart throbbed just as the tutor's heart might throb to-day, with the difference that he had not learned to count its beats, as our enamored youth, 200 years wiser, have learned to do, in a self-controlled manner eminently conducive to the steadying of that obstreperous organ.

What mattered the great insurrection, the cruelties of Judge Jeffries and a fugitive patron with a price upon his head when love had sought shelter in his heart, and she to whom he had built a shrine was just as far away from him as the width of a table.

Of what consequence that she was the Lady Gertrude, the daughter of a noble conspirator and he but the tutor without land or wealth! So he continued his story, looking at his book as though he were reading therefrom.

"And the poor man loved the rich lady and he dared not tell her of his love lest she should scorn him."

"Then surely he was fearful at a nothing, which, methinks, means he was a coward, Master Humphrey."

"A coward, if 'twere cowardly to fear the anger of his lady——"

"Why should he expect such anger?"

"He had naught to offer her but his love."

"Love were wealth enough! But I am tired of your story. 'Tis not so good as you are wont to tell, Master Humphrey; and 'tis out last lesson," she added very gently.

"You will not miss the lessons?"

"No, not my lessons, only the stories—I have loved some of them."

And she moved restlessly in her seat as if she would say more, yet could not find the words.

"But surely my father should be here even now," she murmured at last.

The poor tutor turned pale. "You will go with him to Holland?" he said.

"It would be too great a risk to accompany him, but I follow to-morrow if all succeeds as we have planned. Ah, if they should take him. They have killed the Duke. Why are they not satisfied. Poor Monmouth!"

"They will not take him."

"Now at the last moment I am terrified lest things should not go well. Look at the time! He may be here at any moment. Indeed, he should be here now!"

Then Lady Gertrude rose hastily, and stood—tall even as the young tutor, by her side—with a look of eager impatience on her fair face.

"Not yet time, I think," said he. "To cross the marshes on foot needs indeed an hour."

So they stood irresolute, each with heart for one another and thoughts for the absent fugitive.

"There are learned men in Holland, I am told," stammered the young man, irrelevantly.

"It is so rumored; yet not more than that, there would still be room for another, I am sure, Master Humphrey!"

Which pretty speech nigh overpowered the equanimity of Master Humphrey and threw him into a discourteous silence like enough to pique his noble pupil, who, indeed, felt she had made too bold and had lacked in modesty, since he would vouchsafe no answer.

"Continue your story, sir," she said, with marked coldness. "I have no mind for lessons just now."

"There is no more to tell, my lady," he said.

"'Twas about a poor man."

"Nay, do not challenge him; for he hath an idea 'twere better to be poor-spirited than false-hearted."

"Why should he be either?"

"Were it not a mean thing to harass an unprotected lady and false to betray the trust of her noble parent, his patron, when he was absent risking his life for his country?"

"To harass her would be wrong, sir; to betray a trust a worse wrong; yet I cannot see that, if he loved the lady well, he would be doing either of these things."

"Madam, were I, your humble tutor, the poor man, would you still so reason?"

"Were you that man, Master Humphrey, I could not be sorry for the lady."

"'Tis a fair answer; I crave your pardon! Shall we continue the translation?"

"Were you the man, in truth, I should be sorry for the lady to have so inconstant a lover."

"Inconstant, madam?"

"Who will make you love, wherever he may find a ready listener, though in covert language that shows him from a declaration. Pray, Master Humphrey, if it be as you declare, that you are this man, convey my sympathies to the lady!"

Now the tutor rose in wrath, and would have gone his way, for without doubt his mistress was making sport of him, but the sound of faint footsteps from behind the paneled wall arrested his attention, and he stood still, considering whether 'twere best to go or stay.

"It is my father!" cried the girl, aware that he alone knew the secret passage.

Then Master Humphrey saw a look of joyful relief rise to her pretty face, and he remembered how brave she had been, how good and noble and fair she was, and how miserable a worm was he, and so lifted his head in the pride of humiliation, as humble-minded folk are wont to do in such manner that the Lady Gertrude found him as beautiful and arrogant as a king, for all his shabby clothes and slight stature.

"I may not see you again; he will cross to-day—I to-morrow," she said, in sudden haste.

"God be with you!" answered the tutor, and he bowed low.

* * * * * * *

The fugitive noble stood in the shadow of the open paneling, and the Lady Gertrude, full of apprehension that he should stay too long, strained her ear to catch any ominous sounds from without and drank in eagerly the detailed plans he slowly explained of his own escape to Holland, and her journey hither on the morrow by another route.

When he ended there was a little silence between them, as with those whose hearts are too full to speak. It was speedily broken, however, by a loud ringing of the great bell, which reverberated from the deserted courtyard below through the house. The girl hastened to the casement window and looked quickly out.

"There are armed men," she said. "They have traced you here."

"Wary hounds," he murmured, with a look of grim humor—"to the hole, but not within. Twenty minutes and I shall be beyond the most cunning ferret's scent. God be with you, little daughter! Keep them dallying here a while. Remember to-morrow at Ballam bridge by nightfall!"

The panel fell back and the Lady Gertrude sat down to her books and made much pretense of mumbling to herself as the old doorkeeper, scare-stricken and panting, tumbled into the room with an officer of the king's service on his heels. "Soldiers," said he.

"And, good Oliver, what is their will?" said she, not deigning to raise her eyes from her book.

"No harm to so fair a hostess!" exclaimed the intruder.

Whereupon the Lady Gertrude slowly lifted her pretty head and scanned the uncomely countenance and fat proportions of the officer with much deliberation.

"Should fairness diminish harm, sir, 'twere a pity there were no more of the quality among his Majesty's servants."

"A truce, fair one, to a war of words. I am here to crave your hospitality whilst waiting for the presence of one who, I am informed, purposes to visit his daughter between the time of noon and midnight. You start! 'Tis now hardly noon. We demand to know in the king's name at what precise hour that interview is to take place."

"Sir!"

"'Twere well, madam, to save that pretty head; for those who wilfully harbor the treacherous Monmouth's followers can receive no clemency from his most gracious Majesty, King James. Their life is forfeit, man or woman."

"Sir," said Lady Gertrude, after some moments of seeming fearful deliberation, "I await my lord, my father, here within an hour from now; and may God curse you for a coward!"

The fat soldier grinned. The lady's bark was not loud enough, but her bite was, indeed, most easily averted with a threatening whip, as was the way with women; so he sat his broad person down and did all that which he thought would beguile so pretty a shrew from her fretful humor.

Full three-quarters of an hour thus passed, when news was brought by a breathless soldier that the Earl of W—— had boarded a frigate not fifteen minutes since, and—as was related in all seriousness—had doffed his hat in acknowledgment of the fiery salute from shore.

Whereupon the fat soldier got up in a fearful rage, and kicked and swore, as only a gentleman soldier knows well how to do, and snarled aloud that nothing should save the cunning jade from the lively fate of Mistress Gaunt, who, indeed, was burned to death for a lesser misdemeanor.

But the Lady Gertrude lifted up her proud head and said:

"Even so, I shall deem my father's life most cheaply bought, sir."

And she walked out between the file of armed men, who, indeed, were sorry for so brave and fair a creature, taken thus roughly a prisoner.

* * * * * * *

The poor tutor sat over his books in the upper room of a small dwelling house, and vestled with his thoughts till he knew not which was conscience and which the devil, most plaguing him; for the Lady Gertrude had said that love was wealth, yet his rooms betrayed no signs thereof.

He had a little piece of land not very far away, from which he acquired a small income; yet withal these things could in nowise be counted riches.

Indeed, no, thought he, then hurried footsteps upon the stair became confused with his wandering fancies, and ere he had time to weigh the matter, Lady Gertrude stood before him.

And then something of a sweet shyness came over her, so that all in a great hurry she set to explaining how she had been taken prisoner by the irate colonel, and how, indeed, she had escaped through the help of a cousin among the officers, who, she avowed, had once cared greatly for her.

Then the boy and the girl, for they were not much else, looked into one another's eyes, as they had looked these past days during the lessons he had set out to teach her; and now there was no table between them, so that he knelt down and, taking both her little white hands in his, he covered them with humble kisses, which the lady seemed to have no desire to resent.

"So, after all, Master Humphrey, you must needs take care of your pupil still a little while longer. To-morrow at Ballam bridge at nightfall there will be those waiting to conduct me to Holland, where I think, sir, you told me you had a mind to follow in search of further learning. Yet till then I must remain a prisoner here, for fear of my very life," she laughed.

Now, hardly had she spoke than a clamor without sent the blood from his cheek, and fear at last into the dauntless eyes of the Lady Gertrude.

"Quick! Within!" said he, and thrust open the door of the narrow chamber and closed it upon her. Then the steady tramp of men's feet echoed upon the winding stair.

"In the king's name!" said a tall officer as he entered the room, followed by several men at arms. There was a strange look in his eyes as he met the tutor's gaze, and he faltered in his speech while repeating the common formula.

"There is no one here," answered the student deliberately.

"It is necessary the place should be searched," replied the officer, "and I must warn you that if the prisoner be found your life will be forfeited without trial, as a traitor harboring those in conspiracy against his Majesty's crown."

"There is no one here," repeated the tutor.

"Search," said the officer. He had grown pale as the poor youth, who bent with seeming indifference over his books and clung close to his chair as the men approached the little door, which opened suddenly from within, as a beautiful youth in a velvet suit, with fine lace ruffs and a mass of brown, curly hair, falling negligently about his shoulders, such as was then the fashion to affect, confronted the officer.

"What noisy matter is this?" said he haughtily. "Is there no peace even for students, who, loyal to his Majesty, claim but the quiet of their chambers to pursue the books which tell of mightier deeds than these of the internal wars of a discontented people?"

Now a look of humor crept into the officer's eyes as he bowed perhaps lower than was necessary to so young and haughty a youth.

"I am grieved to so disturb you, sir," said he. "We have been misinformed, for, apparently, the lady we seek is not here," and he turned upon his feet and departed with his men from the lowly roof of the poor tutor.

"Master Humphrey," said the beautiful youth—and his face was crimson even as the skies after the sun hath set—"you risked being hung on high, Master Humphrey, for me." And there were tears in his eyes.

Then, indeed, did nearly all Master Humphrey's fortitude depart. Lady, 'twere but a paltry thing to risk," said he, and bowed his head as one ashamed, and within himself he thought.

"Now, indeed, I cannot woo her, for 'twould be the way of a coward to thus force advantage of a maid's gratitude."

But the while he was pondering she stole up to him and he knew not how it happened, but he wooed her just the same.—Pall Mall Gazette.

WHY SUNDAY IS CHOSEN.

Most Royal Assassinations Have Occurred on the Sabbath.

Sunday seems to be a favorite day for political assassinations of Europe. The death of Canovas on this day recalls the long list of rulers who have either met death or but narrowly escaped it on the Sabbath at the hands of anarchists, communists or nihilists. The fact that in the old world Sunday is the great festival day, when the rulers go around and give their subjects an opportunity to look upon and get near them, is perhaps a sufficient explanation.

Alexander II., the Russian czar, was returning to his palace on the afternoon of Sunday, March 13, 1881, when a dynamite bomb was thrown at his carriage. The carriage was blown to pieces and Alexander died within a few hours.

President Carnot, of France, was at Lyons attending an industrial and art exhibition on Sunday, June 24, 1894. That night as he drove to a theater, Sesare Giovanni Sarilo, a young Italian anarchist, sprang upon the step of the President's carriage and plunged a knife into his abdomen. Carnot died within a few hours.

President Faure narrowly escaped death on Sunday, June 13, last. He was driving on the Bois de Boulogne to witness the Grand Prix at the Longchamps race course, when a bomb was exploded near his carriage. It was of faulty construction and hurt no one.

Two attempts have been made on the life of King Humbert of Italy on Sundays. On Sunday, March 17, 1878, Giovanni Pasanante climbed into the King's carriage in the streets of Naples and stabbed him in the thigh with a sword. The King fought back, cut his assailant on the arm and held him at bay until the police took charge of him. On Sunday, March 26, 1893, a religious fanatic named Beradi attacked King Humbert in the streets of Rome, but was captured before he did any harm.

William I. of Germany, grandfather of the present Emperor, was twice attacked by would-be assassins on Sunday. On July 14, 1861, Oscar Becker tried to shoot him, and on June 2, 1878, Dr. Nobling repeated the attempt. Nobling blew his own brains out when he saw that he had failed.—Washington Star.

LAKE MICHIGAN'S WATERS TO OVERWHELM CHICAGO IN THREE THOUSAND YEARS.

PROF. G. K. GILBERT of the United States geological survey has found by a study of lake levels that the great lakes are slowly tilting to the southwest, and that in 3,000 years, by the present rate of rise, Lake Michigan will flood all the lowland country upon which Chicago is built and drain its overflow into the Illinois river. The learned professor has found that the country to the north of Lake Huron is steadily rising, while that in the vicinity of Chicago is as steadily sinking. He estimates that in no longer than 500 years Lake Michigan will overflow in its high stages; that in 1,000 years it will overflow at ordinary level; that in 2,000 years the western outlet will divide volume equally with the eastward flow by way of the St. Lawrence and that in 3,000 years the whole flow back from Lake Erie will be through the Chicago channel. He asserts that the lake, following a path of overflow that once before, in the last centuries of the glacial age, was its route, will course directly through Chicago, forcing what now is the Chicago river back into the valley of the drainage canal, which is but itself, according to the professor, an artificial aid for hastening what nature has already planned. Prof. Gilbert, in making his statement of facts, figures and theories, sees no hope for Chicago unless the tilt ceases as mysteriously as it has begun. He says that there is no known scientific reason for the rise responsible for the impending spill and that the upheaval, being entirely lawless, may as illogically decide within the course of 100 years or so to bend the other way. Otherwise he is sure that Chicago is doomed; that the waters of the lake will pound clear to the sand hills at Summit, undermining the sky scrapers that may intervene, converting the second city of the land into a watery mass of ruins.

LIVES A LIFE OF EXILE.

Bishop Who Has Charge of Religious Work in the Far North.

Bishop W. C. Bompas, who has charge of the work of the Anglican church in the diocese of Selkirk, in the extreme northwestern part of British America, has lived for over thirty years a life of exile that has few parallels in missionary annals. Since 1865 he has been laboring among the Indians far beyond the comforts of civilization. For twenty-three years of that time he has been a bishop, and though he has repeatedly had the opportunity to choose for his special field of work the more southern and hospitable part of the field, he has resolutely kept himself on the extreme limit. In 1865 Mr. Bompas, then a young English deacon 36 years old, presented himself for ordination to the priesthood in order that he might go out for missionary work. He was assigned to the Mackenzie River and Yukon districts. On Christmas day, 1865, he arrived at Fort Simpson, where he preached a Christmas sermon in the rude church that had already been constructed. In 1874 he was consecrated Bishop of Athabasca, and the journey to England at that time is the only break in his years of service in the Northwest which he has allowed himself. His territory was an enormous one, but he has covered it from one end to another over and over again. So continuously is he traveling and preaching that he cannot be said in any sense to have a home of his own. In 1884 his vast diocese was divided and he retained for himself the northern portion, becoming known as the Bishop of Mackenzie River. In 1890 a further division of territory was made and again Bishop Bompas chose the most outlying portion. For his tactful knowledge of the ways of the Indians and Eskimos, and for his life of continuous self-sacrifice Bishop Bompas is respected wherever known.

BISHOP W. C. BOMPAS.

A California Harvesting Incident.

Four young women clad in bloomers walked into the fields of Lassen County recently and asked permission to work the harvester. They were Orra Dowell, Gertie Sawyer, Lillie Dowell and Nellie Packwood. It was granted them and they proceeded to action. One of them climbed to the driver's seat and began to guide the twenty-six horses around the field, another attended to the binder, a third took charge of the sack sewing, and the fourth ran the separator. A whole morning was spent in this interesting occupation, and then, without mishaps or adventures, they tired, leaving the astonished men in possession. A harvest field is the prettiest sight in the world, with its reflections of soft yellow light from the golden grain, its mist of flying chaff and sheaves of winnowed wheat, oats or barley. Even rough, begrimed, perspiring men look picturesque in this alluring atmosphere, but when in their places pretty girls are introduced the scene becomes worthy of a Watteau.

It would be interesting to know what motives led those adventurous girls to brave the heat and discomfort of their morning's enterprise. Was it just for fun, for a lark? Or are these particular women thinking of setting out to earn their living in a novel way and wished to prove their fitness to objecting friends and relatives? Or was it just an outburst of the "zeitgeist," the spirit of the times? No one seems to know.—San Francisco Examiner.

The Bicycle for Military Use.

The bicycle corps of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry recently rode from Fort Missoula, Mont., to St. Louis, Mo., a distance of 1,900 miles. The commander of the corps has reported to the War Department that the trip required thirty-four days of actual travel, at an average rate of 6.3 miles per hour. A large part of the trip was made under trying conditions, over mountains, and on sandy or muddy roads, with an occasional fording of streams; the men living meanwhile on the regulation field and travel ration. The health of the command was excellent, and none of the soldiers were disabled; the commander thinks that the practicability of the bicycle as a means of military transportation is demonstrated.—Youth's Companion.

Chinese Otters.

The Chinese have completely domesticated the otter. In that country every fisherman has his staff of fishing otters and cormorants. These otters are trained to hunt in company, to attack, pursue, and seize the fish. Travelers who have fished in China state that they have seen good well-trained otters currently sold for $400 each.

Austria's Railways.

Austria, with Hungary, had 5,737 miles of railroad at the end of 1896. The gross earnings were $52,000,000, the working expenses $35,000, and the net revenue $17,000,000 on an invested capital of $570,000,000.

"OLD IRONSIDES."

Gallant Battleship Constitution Now One Hundred Years Old.

"Old Ironsides" is 100 years old, and she survives the wear and tear of peace and war. Charlestown harbor, Boston, was where the launching took place. The American navy is, therefore, just a century old, for the Constitution was one of the first battleships built by the then youthful Government after it had achieved its independence.

"Old Ironsides" was one of the first trio of battleships built by the United States, and is by all odds the most famous vessel that ever floated the American flag. To survive the dangers of war and, what is sometimes more wasting, the decay of peace, through 100 years, is a record more remarkable for a ship than for a man. "Old Ironsides" deserves all the praise lavished on her in speech and song. There is no other vessel the associations of which are enwrapped with so many names familiar in our history, or can boast such a record of gallant achievements by American tars. Hull, Bainbridge, Decatur, Rodgers and Stewart were among her captains. Paul Revere furnished the brass bolts and spikes that went into her sturdy frame. Betsy Ross, "mother of the American flag," sewed the great banner of fifteen stars and fifteen stripes that floated above her when she first breasted the waves. Holmes wrote an ode to her that is familiar to every schoolboy. Lord Byron was once a guest on board and Capt. Dacres, afterward a British admiral, was entertained there as a prisoner. Her record during the war of 1812 included the capture of three first-class British frigates, 154 guns, 900 prisoners and property worth more than $1,000,000.

"OLD IRONSIDES."

It was in 1794, in view of the troubles with Algiers, that President Washington and Gen. Henry Knox, Secretary of War (the navy was not then a separate department), recommended the building of a number of first-class frigates. The country was then without a single man-of-war. The few merchant vessels that had been hastily fitted out for service in the revolution had been dismantled or returned to their earlier uses. Congress was by no means a unit on the plan to establish a navy, and the bill for the building of six frigates of "not less than thirty-two guns" had a majority of only two votes in the House of Representatives.

Of the six vessels thus provided for only three were at once built. They were the Constitution, of 44 guns, 1,576 tons burden and costing $302,719, which was built at Charlestown; the United States of the same size, built at Philadelphia, and the Constellation, of 36 guns and 1,265 tons, built at Baltimore.

The engagement of the Constitution and the Guerriere forms a story that we have all read and gloated over in our school histories. It was the first American victory in the war of 1812, and coming from an unexpected quarter it set the country wild with enthusiasm. When Hull and his victorious crew returned to Boston a great dinner was given to them by the citizens, and John Adams presided; Congress voted a medal to Hull and $50,000 to be divided among the officers and crew; the whole country set to singing praise of the Yankee tars.

The other exploits of the Constitution, including her escape from Admiral Broke's squadron in a three-days' chase, her capture of the Java and later of the Cyane and Levant in a single engagement, are too familiar to require more than mention.

The past half-century has been an uneventful one for "Old Ironsides." She did duty many years as a training ship, and at the outbreak of the civil war she was anchored at Annapolis. It was feared that she would fall into the hands of the Confederates and she was towed to New York. She was afterward removed to Philadelphia, and some years ago was towed to Portsmouth, where she remained until taken back to Charlestown for the celebration in honor of her century of existence. A plan that has been recently put forward in several quarters, and that may be adopted, is to station the old ship at Annapolis or Washington and to fit her up as a naval museum with relics of our earlier naval history. It is believed that by this means she will be assured of preservation for another hundred years, and that she will serve a useful purpose as a constant object lesson in patriotism to the younger generation of Americans.

"Mary had a little lamb; that time has passed away. No lamb could follow up the pace our Mary sets today. For now she rides the airshod wheel, skirts too short by half; no lambkin shares her airy flight, but you can see her calf. But who is there that can complain or cry in in woe "alas! So long as Mary's calf's all right, the lamb may go to grass. So all the men, delighted, gaze, their joy is not a sham; for while the other critter's out, they have no use for lamb."

Last spring there was a great rush from all parts of Australia to the new gold diggings in British New Guinea. Hundreds of men, with poor equipment, arrived at Normandy island or set out on the long journey Mambare river to the gold fields. Both places, however, have failed to justify the hopes of their discoverers, as the yield has been insufficient to pay the heavy expenses of the prospectors. Many of the adventurous miners have lost their lives through fevers or native treachery, and others are waiting for Government aid to get out of the country. So one more South Sea bubble has been pricked and found to be hollow.

Mining Activity.

The Los Angeles Mining News gives the following concerning the activity in Southern California: The past week of the Mining Exchange was a true reflection of the increasing interest in the mining industry in this city. Prospectors are pouring out on the desert from San Bernardino and other points, and work is going on with armies of men where one year ago a pick had not been turned to any extent.

Randsburg, the magic city of the desert, presses on its way, producing larger quantities of gold than eve, with occasional new strikes that bring joy to the hearts of owners and benefit to the camp and investors, but of such frequent occurrence as to become an oftold tale which does not bear repeating. This fall the Virginia Dale and Acton districts are putting on a great show of activity. New stamp mills are going up in all directions and the mining business is engaging the attention of men in all lines of commercial pursuits in this city.

The Virginia Dale District will be one of the scenes of activity. Nearly every day loads of supplies leave this city for that place, and great results are expected this year.

Forest Reservations.

From the report of the Secretary of the interior it is learned that there are nineteen national forest reservations, embracing an estimated area of 13,903,280 acres. Thirteen forest reserves created by the proclamation of February, 1897, were suspended by the Act of June, 1897, until March 1898. These suspended reserves embrace nearly 20,000,000 acres. The Secretary points out that while the law provided for setting apart reserves, it did not provide for their protection and care. Accordingly on recommendation of the department in June, 1897, Congress passed an Act authorizing the Secretary to prescribe rules and regulations needed and to establish such service as was requisite to preserve the reserves.

In the same month the Secretary promulgated the necessary rules and set about to have the reserves cared for. The idea at first was to establish a forest bureau, but the means for its maintenance were not available. However, special guards have been appointed to patrol the reservations and enforce the regulations, while one special agent is making an examination of the whole forest system, as represented in the reserves, with a view to the making of a detailed report for the information of Congress and all the people. The agent who has charge of the forest reserves in a part of this state is the man who originated the idea of setting apart these reservations, and is an enthusiast upon the forestry question. The department looks forward to his reports with more than usual interest evidently.

The Secretary is certainly deeply impressed with the importance of giving great attention to this forestry question, since he dwells upon it and gives much interesting detail concerning it. He says that in the last year there were 370 cases of depredations upon the public timber, involving values to the extent of $635,064.68. There are now pending before the courts cases to the number of 145 involving more than $3,000,000 value for timber unlawfully cut from public lands. He says that all the forest agents of the Government are instructed to congider the protection of the public forests from fire, and from depredations as one of the most important of their public duties. But these employees are not sufficient in number, and the protective laws must largely fail of effect unless Congress authorizes a force to be put into the field numerically strong enough to give the timber reserves the protection they need.

This is not pleasant reading, because it indicates that a very considerable number or people, who would be deeply offended to be designated aa thieves, consider it entirely permissible to destroy public timber, and as rather a shrewd performance as long as they are not caugnt in the act. This moral insensibility to the heinousness of the crime is deplorable. It is of a piece with that other form of excusing conscience that defends one in cheating the Government by smuggling, and is evading the payment of Government dues.

There appears to be a rather wide spread notion that theft from the Government is really no crime, and that he who commits such offenses is more blameworthy for being found out than for perpetrating the crime. If all the people could be deeply and solemnly impressed with the great importance of preserving the forests of the country that protect the mountain flanks, conserve the retention of moisture in the soil, and the gradual rather than the flood supply of streams and rivers; if they could be convinced of the great importance of such conservation of wooded slopes in relation to public health and the non disturbace of climatic conditions, we would have an army of people working for the Government in a volunteer capacity, to aid in preventing forest depredations, and in bringing timber thieves and those who carelessly or purposely start forest fires to justice and swift punishment.

Totten-Harvey.

It was a bright and jovial wedding party that was held at A. C. Harvey's residence in Lone Pine on Thursday, the 25th, to celebrate the marriage of Benjamin F. Totten to Agnes L. Harvey. The ceremony uniting the young people took place early in the day in the prettily decorated parlor of the brides parents, the Rev. Thos. H. Nicholas officiating. The bride was becomingly attired for the occasion, and was supported by her sister, Miss Lutie Harvey as bridesmaid and by her brother, Mr. Fred Harvey. A reception was given in the afternon, when many friends came to express their good wishes and congratulations. Many were the gifts, the following being a partial list:

When evening came and the numerous visitors had left with the request to return for a continuous "keeping it up" in the shape of a dance, the invitation was cordially responded to, and right merrily did the festivities terminate. Again were the good-byes and kind wishes reiterated, and again were Mr. and Mrs. Harvey's never ceasing hospitality and happiness of entertaining commented upon, whether it be at their valley home or round the camp fire on the mountain tour. Randsburg Notes.

The grading camps are now within six miles of Johannesburg, where a temporary terminus of the new road will be established until spring, when the remaining two miles will be completed into Randsburg.

In the Stringer district there are now upwards of fifty dry washers at work, while in the new Pumpkin Roller district and Goler fully as many more are taking out pay dirt. In the Stringer country dry washers are averaging about 12 cents per run of fifty shovels each—not very rich but good wages. Twenty to forty runs are made in a day.

The Banner mine, a late discovery on the western slope of the Randsburg mountains is attracting much attention. A peculiar matter in this connection is that the owners have found tons upon tons of rich boulders on the surfrce, which are broken up and sent to the mill. Returns show that this surface ore averages about $60 per ton. Free gold is visible throughout the rock. No ledge from which the boulders came has yet been found, which circumstance is counted one of the curiosities of the camp.

By actual count twenty-two buildings, including residence and business houses, are now under construction in Randsburg.

An eighteen inch vein of free gold-bearing quartz was uncovered on the Pearl Estella mine in the St. Elmo district last week, and a contract to sink 150 feet thereon has been let.

Perhaps no other mining section of the great West gives more promise of prosperity than the region hereabouts for a radius of thirty miles. Everywhere gold is found on the surface, and dry placering is receiving an impetus that will show astonishing outputs of gold from these diggings this year. The production of gold dust is now estimated at about $1500 per week from the adjacent dry wash diggings tributary to Randsburg.

About 158 tons of ore per day are produced from the Randsburg mines and milled in that vicinity, irrespective of what is shipped away for reduction to Denver, Pueblo and San Francisco.

The stories that come from West Australia show that that colony has a Klondike of its own. Near the Kalgoorlie gold fields alluvial ground has been found which yields enormously. One man in a single morning cleaned up two pounds of nuggets, while two others, in two days, obtained sixty five ounces. The bedrock is from twenty-five to a hundred feet from the surface, but when reached it appears to be lined with nuggets. The new diggings are not in an inviting country, but this Australian desert is a great improvement over the frozen Klondike.

The fact that the Cuban insurgents are able to successfully raid the immediate suburbs of Havana without molestation is the best possible evidence of the weakness of the Spanish forces in the field. The Cuban war has become simply a question of endurance.

Thanksgiving at Big Pine.

Wednesday and Thursday of last week witnessed a great gathering of enthusiasts of the diamond at Big Pine. The hamlet received all with open arms and succeeded in its own hospitable fashion in making every stranger feel at home. The accomodations, eating and sleeping, of the town, were tried to the utmost, but the visitors good-naturedly took whatever was offered, and extracted a huge amount of fun from small quarters. Owing to the Teachers' Institute and Grand Ball Bishop was thinly represented at the base ball tournament, but Independence turned out royally. At one p.m., Thanksgiving, the Big Pine Indian nine and the Independence white boys played the first game. It consisted of nine innings, and the score stood 20 to 14 in favor of the Indians. The Indians showed the best of training and lots of practice, and are certainly a credit to their coachers. The Independence boys showed lack of practice, but Independence will back them against the county if they will get in and practice. The players consisted of the following named men:

NEVER-SWEATS		INDEPENDENCE
George Am	Pitcher	Julian Eibeshutz
Jake Tracey	Catcher.	Norm Mairs
Jesus	1st base	Lester Laird
Jerry	2d base	Alvah Conklin
Charley Shaw	3d base	Deck
Bue Lagrosse.	shor stop	George Naylor
Billy Barlow	left-field	Crom, Harper
Steve Mose	center-field	E. Paulise
Piper	right-field	Charley Rose

Umpires J. Kewley and Geo. Hall in the field.

On Thursday night the young people got up an impromptu dance, Freeman Mitchell and John Schalten furnishing the music. The Ladies' Aid Society gave an old-fashioned Thanksgiving dinner at the church, and for twenty-five cents a sumptuous repast was served.

On Friday the Never-Sweats played the Big Pine while boys, and won the game and first money—$80, the score standing 10 to 27. The Big Pine boys are game, and did well considering their youth and inexperience, but the Indians' long practice stood them in good stead. The Piutes played in the same position as on the day previous, and the white boys stood as follows:

Catcher, Geo. Hall; pitchers, Walter Hanby and Bert Ober; 1st base, Bert Ober and Walter Hanby; 2d base, Frank Schalten; 3d base, Joe Steward, short-stop, Jim Steward; right field, Frank Ober: center field, Steve Gregory; left field, Sam McMurray.

Umpires—W. A. Chalfant and J. Kewlew.

On Friday night a grand ball was given at Callow's Hall, Tom Callow and Miss Nellie Coyle furnishing the music. Young and old participated in the "high jinks," and it was four o'clock Saturday morning before the trippers could sing "After the Ball."

A pandemonium like to a mad-house in a blizzard then reigned for an hour or so, as those who were trying to sleep can certify, and then the boys quieted down at the thoughts of another ball game to be played in the forenoon to decide whether Big Pine or Independence should carry off the second money—$40. The Independence boys played in the same positions as the day previous, the Big Pine boys making the following changes:

Pitcher, Bert Ober; catcher, Jim Steward; 1st base, Geo. Hall; short stop, Frank Ober; right field, Vernon Smith.

They played five innings, the score standing 4 to 10 in favor of the Independence boys. The umpires were D. Hession and Winnie Eldred.

Immediately after lunch the visitors began to pull out for home, and as each wagonload departed for the south the Big Piners gave three rousing cheers for the Independence boys and girls, and the visitors congratulated themselves on having put in three jolly days at Big Pine under the care of Mr and Mrs. Thomas Callow.

Married in Nevada.

On Wednesday evening, November 3, John F. Winter of Newcastle and Annie E. Shaw of Reno, Nevada, were united in marriage at Reno at the residence of the bride's aunt, Mrs. Hogan. Rev. Father Reynolds of the Catholic Church performed the ceremony in the presence of the relatives and a few intimate friends. After a delicious wedding supper Mr. and Mrs. Winter left on the 10 o'clock train for California, visiting San Francico, Del Monte, Pacific Grove and other places. They arrived in Newcastle Sunday evening and will reside at the John C. Boggs residence. Mr. Winter has been the Newcastle agent for Wells-Fargo for the past seven months and during his residence here has made many friends who will congratulate him upon winning from our neighboring state one of its most accomplished daughters.

Miss Shaw was formerly a resident of Inyo county, her parents residing at Big Pine.

After hearing some friends continually praising Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, Curtis Fleck of Anaheim, California, purchased a bottle of it for his own use and is now as enthusiastic over its wonderful work as anyone can be. How to Prevent Pneumonia

At this time of the year a cold is very easily contracted, and if left to run its course without the aid of some reliable cough medicine is liable to result in that dread disease pneumonia. We know of no better remedy to cure a cough or cold than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. We have used it quite extensively and it has always given entire satisfaction.—Olagah, Ind. Ter. Chief.

This is the only remedy that is known to be a certain preventive of pneumonia. Among the many thousands who have used it for colds and la grippe we have never yet learned of osingle case having resulted in pneumonia. Persons who have weak lungs or have reason to fear an attack of pneumonia should keep the remedy at hand. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Croup Quickly Cured.

MOUNTAIN GLEN, Ark.—Our children were suffering with croup when we received a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It afforded almost instant relief. This celebrated remedy is for sale by Nathan Rhine, Druggist. *

First Assistant Postmaster General Heath says that women have proven to be a success in the postal service. Since the time of Adam woman always has been pretty successful in handling the males.—Post.

QUIEN SABE?

Quien sabe?—who knows?—is a phrase in very common use among the Spaniards, and helps over many, many difficulties. It is expressive. What the weather may be the coming winter, who knows? It may be snowy, wet, stormy, cold, freezing and full of sickness and pain, who knows? Some of us today hale and hearty, may lie on beds of torture or hobble about on crutches, who knows? Before the autumn merges into winter, many may have symptoms of approaching trouble; of the old rheumatism coming on, or of first attacks begun; who knows? Who knows? That's a conundrum. But there is one thing everybody knows, the best thing to do is to be ready for the weather coming and to take hold of what is. Everybody knows what is best. With St. Jacobs Oil in the house, everybody knows they have a sure cure for rheumatism, acute or chronic. It is likewise known that in any stage of it the great remedy does its work of cure perfectly. If we suffer, we need not ask who knows, when it is so well known what is best.

"Wonderful how those Indians can play football the way they do." "Not at all; Indians are athletic." "I know, but how do they keep their minds off the other fellows' long hair?"

LEFT DESTITUTE!

Not of worldly goods, but of all earthly comfort, is the poor wretch tormented by malaria. The fell scourge is, however, shorn of its thong in advance by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters its only sure preventive and remedy. Dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation rheumatism, nervousness and kidney complaints are also among the bodily afflictions which this beneficent medicine overcomes with certainty. Use it systematically.

"What do you think the most astonishing event in a man's life?" "His discovery that his children are old enough to think for themselves."

$100 REWARD, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

THE FAMILY STORY

THE GOVERNOR'S TRAGEDY.

As the Governor rode past my grandmother's house on the spring morning when he left the State forever he wore his uniform and carried the sword with which he afterwards led the charge at San Jacinto. He was a tall man, broad-shouldered and well-knit, with a certain graceful stateliness which, though he had it by nature, he had not left uncultivated. It was held in those days to be a mark of the person of quality, and from the time when as a boy of 10 he had lain on the puncheon floor of his father's cabin spelling out Pope's Iliad by the light of a pine knot, the Governor had always felt himself a person of quality.

My grandmother was on the porch as he passed and he bowed low to her, ceremoniously doffing his hat, as he always did to ladies. It was the last time she ever saw him, and though she had been his warmest friend, he kept his own counsel with her as with every one else.

To the day of his death, he never explained himself. "Sir," he would say, in response to every attempt to draw him out, "let us speak of something else." And the bow with which he said it was conclusive. When he had just reached the summit of what had been his ambition; when he was Governor of what was then the pivotal State of the Union, with the Presidency as a possibility for him, and the United States Senate for life a certainty, why it was that he chose to dress himself in his uniform and ride out into the wilderness beyond the Mississippi, never to return, his biographers have not been able to explain except in vague generalities. How my grandmother knew the story I cannot say, further than that she was the friend not only of the Governor himself, but of Virginia Frazer and of John Endicott, the Governor's private secretary, who made the trouble between them.

"It is true, my dear," said my grandmother to me, "that Endicott was a Yankee and an impecunious school teacher, but he was a Harvard graduate and a gentleman. The Endicotts are an excellent family—almost as good as our own, or as Virginia's. And the Governor, you know, though one of the best bred men I ever saw, lacked the great advantage of descent from well-bred people."

Those who conclude from this that my grandmother was something of a Tory will not be wholly mistaken, but if they had known the charming old lady as well as I they would forgive her as easily as I do, even though—which is not likely—they are as radical in their politics as I am thought to be by some.

The Governor's honeymoon was barely over when he left the State. The fact of his resignation, which he had addressed in due form to the presiding officer of the Senate, was not generally known until he was 300 miles away, sitting in a Cherokee cabin, smoking an Indian pipe, as silent and impassive as any other savage of those around him. For that was undoubtedly his idea at the time to renounce civilization forever and live a barbarian among barbarians.

Mrs. Frazer, Virginia's mother, was a famous match-maker and one of the Governor's staunchest partisans. "If he was born in a cabin," she said to my grandfather a few days before the wedding, "he has more brains than any other man in the State. I expect to see him President yet."

With visions of Virginia in the White House and herself as the power behind the throne, she was correspondingly elated on the night of the wedding. It is no part of my purpose to attempt to describe her feelings when the catastrophe came and she found herself face to face with the climax of one of those tragedies which compel silence in all who are incapable of resignation.

When Endicott first met Virginia Frazer he was not more than 25, very handsome, and with an unassuming self-possession which made amends for his lack of the ceremonious courtesy habitual to the society into which he was thrown. There had been a marked attraction between him and Virginia from their first acquaintance, and one who did not know her mother expected it to be a match. But Virginia, before any one knew of her engagement to the Governor, had begun to hold Endicott at arm's length, and after the climax there was never the slightest scandal connecting her name with his.

She was not more than 20 at the time of her marriage. Six weeks later, when she stood before the fireplace of her sitting-room as the Governor entered at 11 o'clock at night, she wore the muslin whose contrasting whiteness had so heightened her brunette beauty on the day after her marriage. The Governor had just come from a conference of his political friends and was flushed and hopeful. His wife did not move as he entered the room. Her face was half averted when, with his usual impressive gallantry, he took off his hat at the door and crossed the room to kiss her hand. He had taken it in his and his lips had almost touched it when she hastily—almost violently—withdrew it. Slipping past him, she stood in the center of the room facing him as he turned, not understanding her at all and thinking that she had begun to develop an unaccustomed playfulness.

She did not leave him long in error. "Do not touch me!" she said in a voice which, though it trembled with excitement, showed the decisiveness of long premeditation. "Do not touch me. I cannot bear it."

The Governor stood motionless, with the puzzled look of one whose intellect is overcome. She might have pitied him and receded had she been capable either of seeing or understanding, but she had become a mere automaton, governed by long-suppressed emotion.

"I cannot bear it!" she repeated. "I do not love you. I have never loved you. I have tried to learn. I cannot. I have tried to become a true and dutiful wife to you. I cannot. I have tried to forget the only man I ever loved. I cannot. There must be an end of it all, and it must come now!"

"Virginia!" said the Governor, helplessly. "Virginia——"

"Do not stop me!" she went on, with increasing rapidity. "I am not insane, though I am near it. I am a good woman, sir. At least, I have nothing with which to reproach myself, except the shame of having allowed them to make you believe I love you. It was all my mother's fault and yours. Why did you follow me? Why did she force me on you, when I did not love you, when I never can love you; when I have ceased to wish to love you?"

She paused a moment for breath. The Governor did not move. He had leaned his elbow on the mantel, and now, with his hand supporting his chin, he stood looking at her blankly.

"I will not be stopped," she said, catching her breath with a sob. "I will tell you everything, everything, the whole miserable truth that is killing me. I love John Endicott. I have never loved anyone else. I never will. He does not know it, and he never can know it, unless you tell him. Now you know what a wretch I am, and you know what you have done to make me so."

As she stopped she drew herself up and threw back her long black hair, which had escaped from her comb and fallen around her face. As yet the Governor's mind had assimilated hardly anything of what she had said. It had come upon him a supreme calamity at the climax of his good fortune. He seemed to himself to have died suddenly and to be striving to wake to consciousness in another world. The one idea which shaped itself clearly in the chaos of his brain was that his wife had never been so splendidly beautiful as now, when she stood with head thrown back and flashing eyes, lifted above herself by the stress of such an effort as no one person ever makes twice in a lifetime, as very few ever make at all. A moment later, overcome by the inevitable reaction, she had rushed sobbing from the room, leaving the Governor still standing at the mantel, immovable, as he had stood since she began.

He had made no attempt to follow her. She had gone only a few minutes when he stood upright, threw back his shoulders, walked twice up and down the room and then took his seat before a writing desk, drawn close to a window overlooking the river. Settling down in the chair with his elbows on its arms and his hands locked across his breast, he looked steadily out of the window, motionless, as the clock on the mantel struck the hours, one after another, until the small, square window panes began to grow luminous with the dawn. Then he rose, and unlocking a drawer in the lower part of his desk, took out a mahogany box with silver-mounted corners and a heavy silver plate in the center of the lid. He unlocked it deliberately, and, taking from it a pair of the long blue steel dueling pistols of the period, tried the l[illegible] of both, and then looking at them, said aloud:

IT WAS THE LAST TIME SHE SAW HIM.

"They are the ones Benton gave me—'The same, sir, I had the misfortune to be obliged to use in my difficulty with my much-respected friend, Gen. Jackson.'"

Before he had concluded his unconscious mimicry of Benton's presentation speech he recognized the fact that he had caught the solemn pomp of that statesman's carefully-modulated periods. The incongruity of the idea grew upon him, and as he turned one of the pistols over and over in his hand he almost smiled at the utter lack of logical sequence in his own mental processes. Simultaneously he seemed to have reached a conclusion, for he replaced the pistols and locked the case. "No," he said, "I will not do it. He is a good boy and it is not his fault nor hers either. She is as good a woman as ever lived, and I am a fool."

He spoke now with the decisiveness he had shown at Horseshoe Bend, where, as everyone knows, Gen. Jackson had called him the bravest man in the army. He was almost cheerful as he rose and left the house, walking towards the bluffs, as was his morning habit, with the light, swinging step he had learned on the trail with the Cherokee friends of his boyhood. He did not return until 11 o'clock, and going straight to his office he found John Endicott, his secretary, waiting for him with a formidable bundle of papers.

"Use your own judgment, my boy, on all that will not keep until to-morrow. I am busy to-day with work that cannot wait."

He passed into his inner rooms as he said this, and began sorting the papers in his private pigeonholes. Endicott could hear him tearing them, but if he wondered, he asked no questions, and the Governor kept up his work long after his usual dinner hour. When he went home he found what he had expected. His wife had gone to her mother, and he never saw her again. It is said he wrote her a most affectionate letter, but if he did, nothing he said in it changed the course of his life or hers. "Nonsense. His heart did not break," said my grandmother. Why, all the world heard of him at San Jacinto. A brave man's heart never breaks while he has work to do."

Perhaps she was right. At any rate, there was no tremor in the Governor's voice as he spoke to her that morning, riding with his horse's head turned toward the old Cherokee trail that led

OUR GREAT GUN FACTORY.

The Washington Foundry, Where Heavy Ordnance Is Made.

The Washington gun foundry is one of the landmarks of the national capital. Inasmuch as it is there that all the high-powered guns and their mounts for the equipment of our modern ships of war are manufactured, it is a place of special interest to visitors in these days of wars and rumors of war. Originally established as a navy-yard for the construction and repair of warships, it was long since abandoned as such, and is now devoted almost exclusively to the manufacture of guns and ordnace materials. The entire gun plant and appurtenances have cost about $2,000,000 and are believed to be fully equal to the demand of the times in supplying the new navy with guns equal in power and efficiency to those supplied to the leading navies of foreign powers.

The gun shop is filled with the most powerful and approved machinery for turning, boring, rifling, jacketing and otherwise finishing the immense rifles required for modern battleships, as well as the smaller rapid-fire guns, which form such an important part of the secondary batteries of the cruiser gunboats, and, in fact, all vessels of war. The largest lathe in the shop, commonly called the "sixteen lathe," was built for turning out gun sixteen inches in diameter of barrel, forty-eight feet seven inches long, and weighing 110 tons. This size has been found too large for practical use, however, and the largest guns made for the navy are of but thirteen-inch caliber.

The lathe which is used for boring the interior of these guns is about 115 feet long and cost nearly $100,000. Smaller lathes are used in the case of the smaller guns. Traveling over these lathes, forty feet from the ground, is an immense crane, capable of raising and carrying from one lathe to another a dead weight of 125 tons. In the center of this building is the shrinking pit, in which are located furnaces for heating the jackets and hoops for use in shrinking the gun tubes. These furnaces are heated to between 600 and 700 degrees, the heating power being naphtha oil with an air blast.

A separate building is devoted to the manufacture of gun mounts and carriages and is provided with the latest and most approved machinery, as is also the projectile shop nearby, in which shells are made and finished.

There are many historic relics in the museum and other buildings at the yard which the watchman in charge will show with an ill-concealed display of pride and patriotism. The two old-fashioned cannon mounted on either side of the avenue near the entrance were captured from the Tripolitans by Capt. Stephen Decatur in 1804.

Near the east door of the gunshop is the original "Long Tom," used with such success by Capt. Samuel C. Reid on the brig Gen. Armstrong in his never to be forgotten engagement with the British fleet at Fayal on Sept. 26, 1814. This gun was presented to the United States by the Portuguese Government a few years ago, and formed a part of the naval exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition. In the rear of the commandant's office is a gun park, where are displayed trophies captured during the war of the revolution, the war of 1812, the Mexican war, and war of the rebellion.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Anecdote and Incident

So long as there are writers there will be many who will never resort to the painstaking labor of Wordsworth, as indicated in the journal of Dorothy Wordsworth: "William has come back tired; he has spent all the day in thinking of an adjective for the cuckoo."

His majesty of Siam is liberal with his orders. He recently gave an Italian painter (for painting one of his wives from a photograph) "the Grand Cross of the Siamese Crown." It is rather a large order. "This cross," said his majesty, graciously, "will entitle you to marry twelve wives; it is a distinction I seldom confer, so I hope you will soon make good use of it."

An eminent preacher, who prided himself upon his ability to discourse without the aid of notes, once got into the pulpit; but, when he found himself face to face with his congregation, his ideas vanished, his mind was a blank. He tapped his forehead, but in vain, his ideas would not come. "My friends," he said, "I pity you; you have lost a fine sermon," and he descended the pulpit steps.

Two freight engines collided near the Kentucky town of Whitlock recently. Both were pretty badly damaged, and one engineer was discharged for carelessness and disobedience of orders. The funniest thing about the matter was the answer of the disobedient engineer to the other, who asked, "Didn't you have orders to meet me at Whitlock?" "Well, d——n it, hain't I met you?" said the engineer who caused the head-on collision.

A friend of mine, says James Payn, had a colonial acquaintance who was very like a certain eminent diplomatist, and plumed himself upon it. My friend met him one evening at a reception, with ever so large a star on his breast. "Oh, come, Jack, this won't do! I don't believe there are orders of that size in the other hemisphere. Where did you get it from?" The much-decorated one smiled sweetly on him, and replied in excellent English. "I received it from my sovereign, sir; I think you are in some error. I am the —— embassador."

Conan Doyle tells a story of a friend of his who had often been told that there is a skeleton in the cupboard of every household, no matter how respectable that household may be; and he determined to put this opinion to a practical test. Selecting for the subject of his experiment a venerable archdeacon of the church, against whom the most censorious critic had never breathed a word, he went to the nearest postoffice and dispatched this telegram to the reverend gentleman: "All is discovered! Fly at once!" The archdeacon disappeared and has never been heard of since.

The Bishop of Worcester, England, once had occasion to travel through Banbury by rail. Being desirous to test and at the same time to encourage the far-famed industry of that town, he beckoned a small boy and inquired the price of the celebrated buns. "Threepence each," said the boy. The bishop thereupon handed him sixpence and desired him to bring one to the car, adding: "And with the other threepence you may buy one for yourself." The boy shortly returned, complacently munching his Banbury, and, handing the threepence in coppers to the bishop, exclaimed: "There was only one left, guv'nor."

A careless mason dropped a brick from the second story of a building on which he was at work. Leaning over the wall and glancing downward, he discovered a respectable citizen with his silk hat jammed over his eyes and ears, rising from a recumbent posture. The mason, in tones of apprehension, inquired, "Did that brick hit any one down there?" The citizen, with great difficulty extricating himself from the extinguisher into which his hat had been converted, replied, with considerable wrath, "Yes, sir, it did. It hit me." "That's right," exclaimed the mason, in tones of undisguised admiration; "noble man, I would rather have wasted a thousand bricks than have you tell me a lie about it."

Some years ago Judge Stipp, of Princeton, was pleading a damage case before the Illinois Supreme bench. A short time before the court had decided an almost similar case, in which one of the parties had lost fingers, against the injured man, saying in their decision: "The party being an attorney, his injury does not keep him from 'climbing those heights where fame's proud temple shines afar.'" Mr. Stipp was deep in the point of law when his remarks were interrupted by the justice who wrote the former decision, who said: "Was not this point covered in a decision a short time ago by this court?" "Yes, your honor," replied the attorney, "it was, but my client has lost his toes, and has no claws to 'climb those heights,' etc." The other justices smiled audibly and the lawyer was allowed to finish in peace.

The late Senator George, of Mississippi, was an agnostic, while his wife was deeply religious. She placed a neighboring Baptist minister on his trail, and he got no peace. Once, riding slowly home from Carrollton and reading his mail, the preacher burst out of the woods on his right hand and began. They came to a creek and crossed it. It was, in the Senator's language, "saddle-pocket deep." On the further bank he dismounted. "Git down," he said, fiercely. The minister looked at him doubtfully. He feared a personal encounter. "Git down!" He got down. "Now," said George, "I'm tired o' bein' harried around th' kentry like I was a cotton-tail rabbit an' you was a pack o' nigger dogs. Baptize me right here." It was winter-time, but the venerable statesman would not be denied. The two men waded into the icy water up to their armpits, and the ceremony was performed. Senator George climbed into his saddle and looked down on the shivering evangelist. "Now," he said, "you go home and stay home. I'm through with this —— foolishness."

Real Estate in Paris.

An idea of the prevailing price of land in Paris may be gained from a list of awards to owners of property in the French capital that was taken possession of for the widening of streets. The prices given are for the land alone, this apparently being either assessed separately, or possibly seized separately, under the curious French law, which enables a town to take and pay for the land only to be used for improvements, leaving to the owner the use of the building upon it, so long as he can make it stand without repairs.

The most expensive piece of land mentioned in the assessment was one on the Rue Tiquetonne, a short and narrow street, which, however, extends directly from the postoffice to a wide street, the Rue de Turbigo. For this tract of 1,800 francs per square meter was awarded, about $33 a square foot, or $4,950 per front foot, allowing an average depth of 150 feet.

In the Rue d'Aboukir, not far off, which leads from the Grand boulevard directly to the Bank of France, only $15 a square foot was awarded, or $2,250 a front foot, averaging the depth of 150 feet. Next to that on the Rue Tiquetonne, the most valuable piece of land taken was on the Rue Herod, far off in the suburb of Auteuil, for which $27 a square foot was paid, or $4,050 a front foot, averaging the depth at 150 feet.

Among the cheaper tracts was one on the Rue du Bac, famous among the ladies as the one on which the famous Bon Marche is situated, which brought $9 a square foot, equivalent to $1,350 a front foot, with a depth of 150 feet. The cheapest lot of all in the thickly settled part of the city was one on the Chemin des Meuniers, near the park of Vincennes, and close to the vast warehouses of Bercy, for which only 36 cents a foot was paid, or $54 a front foot; while a lot on the Avenue Daumesnil, near by, the principal street of the Bercy region, brought only about $1.25 a square foot, or $187.50 a front foot.—St. Louis Republic.

SEES THROUGH HIS NOSE.

Frenchman Whose Nasal Organs Have Taken the Place of His Eyes.

A Paris paper published a few days ago an account of a man who can see through his nose. This extraordinary person, it seems, was born blind, and by systematic training has been enabled to make his nasal organ take in some measure the place of his eyes. The story was read far and wide, and it is safe to say that the majority of readers gave little credence to it. Extraordinary things are daily happening, but most of them are conceivable, and hence credible. But how is it possible for a man to see through his nose? Many asked this question and waited in vain for a satisfactory answer. If such persons, however, will look into an old book, which was printed in Nuremberg, in 1702, they will find a record of a case very similar to that recorded in the Paris journal. This book is entitled "Oculus Artificialis Teledioptricus Sine Telescopium Est," and it is the work of the distinguished German scholar, Johann Zahn. Copies of it are very rare, and the one which was consulted in the present instance was found in the University of Bologna.

The man who, according to Zahn, could see through his nose was a farmer. While he was still an infant he met with a serious accident, which resulted in the loss of his right eye. A few years later he fell from a cherry tree and lost his left eye. His nose and left cheek were terribly mangled at the same time, and it was a year before the wound was healed. When he was well enough to go out of doors the blind lad would sit in the garden and warm himself in the sun. Now one day he fancied that he saw through his nose a dim ray of light. He was naturally puzzled, but next day he noticed the same unaccountable phenomenon. Week after week and month after month he looked for this ray of light and, strange to say, it not only never failed him, but, as time passed, it grew more constant and more potent, until at the end of five years he was able to see all objects within a reasonable distance. Here, however, is a curious fact. He was able to see all objects on the ground or in front of him, but he could not see any objects above him. Zahn vouched for the truth of these statements and said that the distinguished physician, Heinrich Spezius, was also ready to make an affidavit as to their truth. Skeptics may say that the man was shamming, but as both eyeballs were lost it is difficult to see how shamming was possible. Of course, the man may have imagined that he saw objects on the ground or in front of him, but, according to Zahn, he was subjected to tests which proved to the satisfaction of all eye witnesses that he was not imposing on them. There must be some explanation of this amazing phenomenon, and if there is really in France now a person who can see through his nose he certainly deserves to be made the subject of serious study.—New York Herald.

One on the Grocer.

They are telling a good story on my friend, the grocer, next door. The other day a woman came in and said: "I want two dozen hen's eggs. They must all be eggs laid by black hens."

The grocer said: "Madam, I am willing to accommodate you, but you have got the best of me this time. I don't know how to tell the eggs of a black hen from those of a speckled or white one."

Said she: "I can tell the difference mighty quick."

"If that is so, madam, will you kindly pick out the eggs for yourself?"

She did so, and when the two dozen were counted into her basket, the grocer looked at them, and said, suggestively: "Well, madam, it seems as though the black hens laid all the big eggs."

"Yes," said she, "that's the way you tell them."—Hardware.

The Indian, Walla Tonka, came back to be shot.

ONE of the striking features of the base-ball world during the past season was the playing of a team composed exclusively of Indians from the Indian Territory. One of them attracted more than usual attention by his unusual skill in playing, and many came to the conclusion that he was the equal of some crack players. His name was Walla Tonka. He had a peculiar history. It was as true as it was romantic. An Indian's verbal promise is said to be as good as the white man's written contract. This has certainly been verified in the case of Walla Tonka. Three years ago Walla Tonka attended a green corn dance at Ultima Thule in the Choctaw Nation, near the Arkansas line. There he met a beautiful Indian maiden named Tookah Ingamore, who completely captured the affections of the young brave. He fell madly in love with her. He determined to claim her for his own. But he learned that he had a rival. He bore the euphonious name of Eagle Eye. It appears that he was more favorably received by the dusky maiden than Walla Tonka. But this did not deter him in his resolve. He offered Tookah's father thirty-five ponies for his daughter. To his consternation he found out that his rival had been there ahead of him and the deal had been closed. This was too much for poor Walla Tonka. He determined on revenge. In an unguarded moment he shot his rival through the heart. The excitement was intense. Walla Tonka was brought before a judge selected from among the tribe, tried and sentenced to be shot. While the trial was speedy the execution of the sentence was delayed. The condemned man was given three years in which to make his arrangements for death. He was not cast into prison, but was let go on his parole of honor that he would return to receive the sentence imposed by the court. No one who knew the young brave doubted that he would return to be executed. Not long after the killing of his rival, Walla Tonka went again to the father of the maiden and renewed his suit. The old warrior was willing and agreed that the wedding should take place. His daughter was beginning to forget her dead lover and to admire the bravery of Walla Tonka. Walla and Tookah lived together happily for three years. During this time Walla had become a proficient base-ball player and was earning a handsome salary. He was a faithful husband and provided liberally for his companion. They lived in a little cottage in the heart of the Indian country, and while they must have often thought of the coming doom for Walla, there was no visible sign of anything but happiness. At last the day arrived when Walla should be shot. His wife was inconsolable. Having arranged as well as he could for the future, he bade her an affectionate farewell and started for the place of execution. No guards accompanied him. He went alone. A great crowd had assembled. His approach was the signal for many manifestations of approval. After blindfolding him, his hands were tied behind him. His breast was bared and a small piece of white paper placed over the heart. The next instant there was the sharp crack of a rifle and the murder of Eagle Eye was avenged.—St. Louis Republic.

TYPEWRITING WITH HIS TOES.

view of Texas. He writes his articles with his toes or with the pen held in his mouth, nor does he consider this achievement as at all extraordinary.

Mr. Smith is a native of Miller County, Arkansas, and was born without arms. He acquired the gift of using his feet for hands early and as naturally as other children learn to use their hands. When quite small he learned to feed himself with his feet, and at the age of 7 had learned to write. About this time he entered school, standing at the head of his classes. He was no less at home on the playground, where he engaged in games of marbles, croquet and ball, becoming an expert in marbles and croquet.

At an early age he began to map out a course of life and to realize the importance of a thorough education. Want of funds, however, prevented more than a high school education, but he afterwards finished the courses of philosophy and logic and others at home. To this fund of knowledge he has added by extensive reading.

Mr. Smith's boyhood days were spent in Cass County, Texas. He moved to WRITING WITH HIS MOUTH.

Mount Pleasant, Texas, in November, 1888, where he studied law and was admitted to the bar the following spring at the age of 20. Success attended his efforts from the first. He built up a good law practice, and his ability as a lawyer attracted immediate recognition. He was particularly strong in his arguments before a jury. In September, 1893, he formed the idea that the newspaper business offered a more inviting field to one of his physical disabilities and, finding the Mount Pleasant Times-Herald for sale, purchased it. He has managed it with great success, making it one of the best county papers in Texas. All this time he has taken an active interest in politics. In 1894 he was the Democratic nominee for county judge and was a member from Titus County of the State Democratic convention in 1896, which elected delegates to the Chicago convention. He is also a member of the Texas Press Association.

Fad of Climbing Mountains.

Then newest fad among Parisiennes at the moment is mountain climbing for women, and there is so much opposition made to the bold and even reckless manner in which they go about it that the authorities have taken steps to have the matter well considered and the safety of such undertakings pronounced upon. The fair ones are contesting the honor of becoming the Bride of Mont Blanc, as the daring climber is called. This is not the first time that the ascent has been attempted by women. Early in this century Mlle. d'Angeville, opposed by all who knew her, and even by the citizens of Geneva, ventured upon this, then wholly unheard of, enterprise. She accomplished it after great fatigue and intense suffering.

"In this age," said a summer traveler recently, "most people are content to go up Vesuvius and the Rigi on the comfortable funicular, since the view from the summit is the object, and that remains the same whatever the means of ascent. But since Mont Blanc has no funicular, and the ascent is an interesting feat to perform, naturally women are ready to endure anything to accomplish it."

MAID WHO DRIVES TROTTERS.

Miss Elliott, Champion of Her Sex as a Woman Jockey, in a Race.

While it has been of common occurrence for women to participate in races here and there over the country during the last few years, it usually has been their practice to drive either to wagon, a four-wheeled vehicle, or to cart. At the Taunton fair, in the fall of 1870, Miss Julia Woodard, a young lady of twenty, drove in competition, with several gentlemen for prizes to be given to the best family horse. Miss Woodard drove a top buggy, and was awarded a prize. In Kansas, some three years ago, a woman campaigned a stable of several trotters, but although she was the active manager, and often drove the horses in their work, she did not drive in the races. At South Farmington, for several years past, the management of the fair annually held there has given a purse for which only women drivers were eligible to compete, and the race has always been one of the most interesting of any on the program. The majority of those who have driven in these races have been married women, driving to light road wagons or to carts, no special style of dress being demanded for the occasion.

DRIVER AND RACE WINNER MISS LEOLA ELLIOTT.

So far as the writer knows, Mrs. I. F. Crosby, who is the owner of Cape Cod farm, was the first woman to mount the sulky just like a man and drive in races, which she did some two or three years ago. She proved herself a handy driver, and possessed of a cool and level head under excitement, which is an essential requisite to one who aspires to drive in a race. Mrs. Crosby is not at all bold or aggressive, but, on the contrary, is a retiring, modest little woman, who loves horses. Last year Mrs. Harriet Winch of Middlebury, Vt., drove to cart at many of the large fairs throughout New England, the fast pacer Major Wonder, and it was an easy task for Mrs. Winch to drive the steady-going fellow miles around 2:12.

It has remained for the season of 1897, however, and the state of Maine, to give the full-fledged horse race where all the drivers were women, the horses hitched to sulkies, and the fair sex barred from no right extended to men under the rules of racing. It was at Pittsfield, Me., that these women drove their initial race, and here, as at the state fair at Lewiston, Miss Leola Elliott, the twenty-two-years-old daughter of a farmer, who lives in Orient, Aroostock county, was the winner, although Mrs. Crosby, who won second money, drove the fastest mile of the race, which was in 2:25½. Of the four women drivers, all but Miss Elliott are married. Mrs. Mary Woodcock, winner of third money, lives at Ripley. Mrs. Henry Meader drove Pilot Morrill, who is owned by her husband. Miss Elliott has always lived upon a farm, and has devoted a great deal of her time to caring for domestic animals of all kinds, but the colts and horses have been her hobby. She is little of form, rather delicate on the whole, in appearance, yet what she lacks in physical powess, is more than made up in tact and an ingenious use of her limited muscular strength. She wood, and has given her a record of 2:20½.

ARCH ROCK MUST GO.

It Is Dangerous and the Government Will Remove It.

Arch rock, one of the "sights" of San Francisco bay, will be removed by the government. It is the most conspicuous of the twenty-four dangers to navigation which have been located and charted in the bay. The rock is twenty-six feet long at low-water and rises to a height about equal to its length. It is of soft rock and the waves beating upon its base during uncounted years have worn a hole twelve feet in diameter entirely through the mass. Small boats can pass under the arch thus formed.

Owing to the formation of the rock under water an area of 30,000 square feet will have to be included in the operations in order that a uniform depth of thirty feet may be obtained. Tunnels such as were used in clearing Hell Gate will not be necessary, since the rock is so soft as to admit of attack by drills operated from boats. The work will require about two years for its completion, the climax being one tremendous explosion, by which, if the calculations are correct, the great ledge will be instantly demolished. The spectacle will be grand in the extreme.—Chicago News.

OVER THE HILLS AND FAR AWAY.

Over the hills and far away,
A little boy steals from his morning play,
And under the blossoming apple tree
He lies and he dreams of things to be;
Of battles fought and of victories won,
Of wrongs o'erthrown and of great deeds done;
Of the valor that he shall prove some day
Over the hills and far away—
Over the hills and far away!

Over the hills and far away,
It's oh for the toil the livelong day!
But it mattereth not to the soul aflame
With the love for riches and power and fame!
On, O man; while the sun is high;
On to the certain joys that lie
Yonder where blazeth the noon of day,
Over the hills and far away!

Over the hills and far away,
An old man lingers at close of day;
Now that his journey is almost done,
His battles fought and his victories won,
The old-time honesty and truth,
The trustfulness and the friends of youth,
Home and mother—where are they?
Over the hills and far away—
Over the hills and far away?

THE NEW COOK.

CERTAINLY I was in an awkward fix. My husband did not see it, of course, and when I had said for the thirteenth—I love to be accurate—for the thirteenth time that evening, "Whatever am I to do?" he only replied, to his newspaper, apparently, "If money will be of any use to you, dear, I can let you have a blank check."

I very nearly said: "It has taken more than money to keep your house properly for the ten years we have been married. It takes brains," but he is such a dear, good fellow, that I stopped in time.

However, at the fourteenth time of asking, he simply replied, "I'm going to bed," and went.

I still sat thinking. To be sure, it was only the cook who had left suddenly that day on account of bad news from home. With the assistance of the housekeeper I had contrived to prepare a respectable enough little dinner for once, and, for the matter of that, could have contrived to do so until I was properly "suited."

I do not change my women servants often. The boy is a more valuable quantity, but when I do I prefer to wait a little rather than take just anybody.

Still, there was that friend of George's brother Jim, in Queensland, coming on Thursday to spend a few days, and this was Tuesday.

I could not put him off, as it was the only time he had free, and Jim had seemed really anxious that we should meet him.

"Harry is terribly cut up over the loss of his wife, through that dreadful mistake of which I think I told you in my last letter."

He hadn't. Just like Jim's carelessness.

"This was, indeed, the cause of his coming home. He is a fine fellow and a true friend, too true a friend, indeed, to one thoroughly undeserving," continued Jim, somewhat irrelevantly.

"But the virtues of Harry Gordon can by no possibility breakfast and luncheon and dine him for three solid days if I don't succeed in getting a cook," I concluded as I wandered sleepily upstairs. "I must try Miss Griggs at the Young Women's Christian Association rooms, and take whoever she offers me."

Thitherward I accordingly wended my way the following morning as soon as I had got George comfortably breakfasted and dispatched to the office.

Miss Griggs heard me with attention.

"Well, Mrs. Mason, I think I have a girl living here at this moment who might exactly suit you, provided you are willing to take everything about her on trust. I have been constrained to do this for the sake of her sweet, true face. I can't say that I would go to every mistress with that suggestion——"

"But, you know," interrupted I, "that we look at things from the same standpoint, and remember that in the highest sense we are every day being taken on trust ourselves."

She smiled, nodded, and left the room.

A moment later the door opened gently and a slight, graceful girl of about 23, with brown hair and eyes, and pale, regular features, stood before me.

She was very simply dressed in a well made blue serge gown, but her soft, low voice, a little nervous in its accents, was beyond all possibility of doubt the voice of a lady.

I was so much fascinated by that voice—a deep, musical one, the kind that haunts you, with the faintest suspicion of a foreign accent in it, and yet not foreign either—that I scarcely know how I stumbled through the usual questions.

"What is your name?"

"Mary Steven."

"Have you any written character?"

"None."

"Can you give any references?"

"No, ma'am."

A pause.

Suddenly she proudly raised her pretty head.

"I have no character, madam, and no references. I shall not tell you anything about myself but my name. I like your face. You seem a motherly, Christian woman." (Motherly, and, again, woman to me!)

"I like you," continued this strange creature, "and if you are willing to give me a quiet corner in your household and some small wages, for I have no money"—as if I would take anybody's services for nothing—"I believe you will find me a capable cook and a faithful servant."

Quite a little speech, you see, with delicate cheeks all ablaze, and tiny hands nervously clenched.

"My dear," said I, impulsively, "I will take you on trust."

So my new cook came home. Four faultless meals she prepared, and ere the hour for the fifth arrived Harry Gordon arrived also.

He was a tall, thin, quiet man, with wavy hair, almost pure white, though he could not be over 35, brushed back off his temples.

Not at all my idea of an Australian shepherd king, which indeed he could scarcely now be called, as of late years he had devoted himself much to colonial politics. Indeed, if Jim's rarious account could be believed, a great future lay before him in that direction, could he only shake off the load of depression which appeared to be resting on him. He seemed, as my husband remarked aside to me, "in great want of a mental tonic."

Still, his conversation was most agreeable. He had been a keen observer of men and things, and could relate his experiences well.

Only he seemed burdened with a strange reserve. His home he never mentioned, nor the dear, dead wife. Perhaps he could not trust himself to speak of these with composure—at least not yet.

Jim had intrusted a small parcel to him for us, and a short time after dinner he rose to leave the room to fetch it.

At the same time I felt rather than heard a light footstep ascending the stairs. Carelessly I noted it.

"It is Mary going to bed. She was up early."

Her room was on the top flat, and to reach it she had to ascend the front stairs.

Mr. Gordon had just paused on the landing, his hand still lightly catching the handle of the door.

Suddenly the footsteps faltered—stopped.

"Harry!"

"Marie!"

The man's heart was in the cry.

The little feet flew on as if on wings.

The door reopened, and with the face of one transfixed he again stood before us.

My husband started up.

"What is the matter?"

I am afraid I lost my head a little, and to relieve the strain of the situation remarked foolishly:

"Mr. Gordon looks as if he had seen a ghost instead of such an ordinary person as the cook."

"The cook!" he repeated. "Mrs. Mason, it is my wife!"

George found his voice first.

"But I thought you said you had lost your wife?"

A new light broke upon me.

Yes, "lost," but "found."

I do not generally speak to my husband in a tone of authority, but on this occasion I did.

"George," I said, "go down to your study directly and wait for me there. Stop here, Mr. Gordon."

I went up to Mary's room—a tiny box of a place, 10 feet by 7, but I like each of my girls to have a room, however small, that she can call her own. The girl lay prone upon the little white bed.

"Mary," I said, "you must come downstairs."

She shuddered.

"Is she with him?"

"She? Whom?" said I. "Oh, there has been some sad misunderstanding! Come with me."

I led her, unresisting, to the drawing-room door and left her there.

At this point I may as well tell you the story which we gathered in detached bits later on.

In her maiden days in that distant colony Marie Steven had two lovers, friends of one another, and bearing the same Christian name. There was, however, in her mind, no question of choice between them. For her Harry Gordon was and always had been the only man in the world.

For some time after the marriage the friendship between the two men continued to all seeming unimpaired. Then ugly whispers in regard to Gordon's happiness and personal affairs began to float about. These had, of course, originated solely in the fertile brain of his respectable namesake, and by him it was duly arranged that they should reach the ears of the young wife. Perhaps from a dread of hearing them confirmed by his own lips, she from day to day delayed repeating them to her husband. Wild suspicions tore her heart and left her with no rocks of firm faith on which to cling in the crisis that was fast coming.

Sitting alone one afternoon Marie was surprised by the entrance of her husband's friend. He placed in her hand the letter of a woman signing herself, "Your deserted wife," and conjuring Harry to remember the promise of other and happier days.

"Can you doubt his guilt, Marie, or my disinterested love? This letter must have broken all ties between you. Come with me, and in the old country we shall together begin a new and happier life."

"Yes, to the old country I shall go, but alone, with no meaner man. 'Not Lancelot, nor another.' There I shall indeed begin a new life. There he can never discover me nor persuade me to condone what this reveals."

That same evening one of the great Pacific liners sailed with a new stewardess, who had turned up at the last moment, soliciting employment just in time to fill the place of one who had been taken suddenly ill.

* * * * * * *

More than an hour later we went upstairs, to find our guest and my cook satting on the big sofa before the drawing-room fire, neither of them saying much, apparently, but the little brown head nestling where it should always have been and measureless content in both their eyes.—Princess.

The Treadwell is the largest gold mill in the world, yet 300 stamps are to be added immediately. This will give it a total of 540 stamps, and the ore can then be mined and milled at a cost of less than $1 a ton.

The following excerpt from the agricultural column of the Bodie Miner Index may be of interest: "This morning we made a discovery. It was a revelation, in fact. Seeing a cow eagerly browsing on a manure heap we exclaimed, 'Eureka! There's where you get your odoriferous limberger.' "

On Wednesday of this week over three hundred head of hogs, which had been gathered up in small lots in Mason Valley, were shipped from Wabuska. The porkers were purchased by Omaha, Nebraska, dealers, and were shipped to that point. The price paid was 3½c per pound, on foot.

For a while it was thought that the advanced price of wheat and other farm produce would lessen interest in sugar beet culture. But the movement for this industry is stronger than ever. A number of new factories are being built and many more are projected. The analyses of beets, as far as made, from experimental plots, have been quite satisfactory, and the establishment of factories is being earnestly considered in many localities in all parts of the country.—*Sac. The Mint Breaking Records

This is a record-breaking year with the United States Mint at San Francisco. There are two great features of interest in the story of its year's operations. One is that since August 1 it has been swelling the vast total of the coinage of the United States with a greater flood of gold than has ever poured from its busy stamps in its history. The other is that since that same date it has been unable to supply the vastly increased demand for $5 gold pieces and subsidiary silver that the new prosperity has occasioned in the channels of trade.

The gold coined during the calendar year amounts to over $30,000,000, and the coinage for December will make the total over $34,000,000. In 1895 the total gold coinage was $23,950,000. Only twice in the history of the mint has this been exceeded. In 1878 the gold coinage was $35,092,00, and in 1879 it was $36,209,500. In only one other year, 1877, was the $30,000,000 mark passed. But this year the mint has been in operation only eleven months as compared with twelve months in these banner years. Had operations not been suspended during all of July when the settlement of its affairs and its transfer to the new superintendent, Frank A. Leach, were in progress, the gold coinage for the present year would have exceeded that of 1879. As it is, the record is broken by the average monthly rate and by the output for September, which was the largest of any month in the eistory of mint, which, since its establissment in 1854 has coined more tnan half the total gold coinage of the United States in all its history. During the three months of August, September and October, the coinage of double eagles alone was $14,150,000. For some years the average mgnthly rate of the total coinage has been about $2,000,000.

It is interesting to know in connection with this brilliant record that during those three great years of gold coinage, which were also the banner years for silver coinage, the mint operations were conducted with two shifts of employees, and the capacity of the mint was thus doubled. There are now nearly 40 per cent fewer employees than then.

Silver coinage is also going on at a rapid rate and will approach $7,000,000 for the year. During November 600,000 silver dollars were coined and the total silver coinage for this month will approximate $750,000. All this increase has come along with the new prosperity. In the four months from August 1 to December 1 over 1 over $20,000,000 in gold and silver has been cracked out by the busy coiner, A. T. Spotts. In October the dumber of coins struck was 1,264,000.

There are two reasons for the phenomenal output of minted gold during the last half of the year. One is the increase in the gold production on the Pacific Coast, and the other and chief one is the heavy imports of gold from Australia in payment for the heavy wheat shipments and the general balance of trade in our favor. In one month $3,500,000 in English sovereigns were received from Australia, and about $10,000,000 of her Majesty's gold coins have gone into Uncle Sam's melting pots on Fifth street in the past few months.

But with all its activity the mint was unable during the busy months of the fall trade to supply the demand for small change throughout all the state, and as all the Pacific Coast harvests were large, business was brisk and the call for the smaller coins was great. The mint felt this demand through the United States Sub-Taeasury, through banks and through individuals who came to the mint with sacks of double eagles to exchange for smaller coins. At times there would be quite a line of men with these bags of gold at the cashier's window.

During August, September, October and November there was coined $1,305,000 in five dollar pieces alone. This was much more than double the entire coinage of that denomination during all of 1896, yet the demand for half-eagles was so great that it could not be supplied, and at one time the rushing coiner, who was keeping busy all the dies of that denomination, was nearly three weeks behind in his orders. The demand for these coins has now lessened somewhat, and there are a few cooling at the mint.

The demand for half dollars is still more than the mint can supply. During the the three months from August 1 the the coinage of this denomination was $257,000. They are still being coined rapidly and go out as fast as they are made mainly to the Sub-Treasury. During 1896 the coinage of 10-cent pieces was $89,790. During the three months mentioned it was $70,000, or 700,000 pieces. The tale of the quarters is a similar one.

The total amount of silver coin given out at the mine in exchange for gold during the four months succeeding August 1 was $500,000, which is ordinarily the exchange for a year.

The fear is gaining ground, it is said, in European political circles that there is danger close at hand of an uprising in Austria against Imperial rule. The International Social Democracy appears to be convinced that it is now strong enough to make a demonstration against the Government. This fact, it is averred, explains the scandalous scenes in the Reischrath the other day when that dignified body became a howling mob.

But we discredit the news of the fear. The Socialists are unquestionably overestimating their strength. They are counting upon easily disaffecting Hungary, in which expectation, we think, from some study of Austrian politics as reflected in the press of that country and the various European reviews, they will meet disappintment.

There is a body of unrestful Hungarians who are ready for revolt, but the great body of the people are not now prepared to unite with Austrian Socialists, however willing they might be to attempt severance from the empire and the independent establishment of the Hungarian State.

The outbreaks among the Austrian people reported within the last few days seem to be confined to the socialistic class, and do not involve the solid business and social interests of Austria communities. The report that the Emperor will dissolve the Reischrath, remove the Premier, Badeni, and go the country on new elections, is probably true. It would be the natural course for him to pursue, and will be wiser than to attempt to use the bayonet.

Such reformation of the Cabinet and the appeal to the ballot will in all probability, indeed, it may be accepted as a certainty, restore order throughout the empire and give the Government the approval of the mass of the people in the representative house of legislation to be newly chosen. In short, Austria is not ripe as yet for revolution; the monarchial traditions are not yet sufficiently shaken there to warrant the belief that imperialism will be overthrown for these many years in the realm of Francis Joseph.

Rev. D. S. Johnston, who is the pastor of the church which President McKinley attends in Washington, thinks the dangers which beset this country are "rum, socialism and Jesuitism." The preacher has probably not heard that the A. P. A. organization has gone by the board and is also ignorant of the fact that Attorney-General McKenna is a Catholic and is soon to be promoted to the supreme bench of the United States. There are some preachers whose mouths are their grertest enemies, and Rev. Johnston appears to be one of them. It will be a long day before small-bored politicians can successfully inaugurate another revival of religious intolerance in the United States. It is usually about a quarter of a century between such visitations, and another is not due for twenty years.

Report of Grand Jury

In the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California.

To the Hon. Walter A. Lamar, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California.

We, the Grand Jury, impanneled in the said Superior Court on the 7th day of December, A.D., 1897, hereby report to the Court that we have examined the Court House, and find the same in fair condition, and recommend that the water be piped into the court house and that the jail be provided with a water closet.

We have examined the County Hospital and find the buildings in fair condition, kept clean and well ventilated; the beds are also in good condition and kept clean. We find the number of patients now at the said County Hospital to be six, as follows: four males and two females, and as far as we can learn, they are all comfortably kept, and well satisfied with food, lodging and accommodations, and with medical and other treatment received by them.

We have examined the books kept by the clerk, auditor and recorder, and the various records kept in the said recorder's office, and also the books kept by the Sheriff and tax-collector, and find all of said books and records kept in a neat and orderly manner.

We have also examined the books and cash accounts of the treasurer's office, and counted the cash on hand, and find the same correct.

From the limited examination possible for us to make, under the circumstances, we do not deem it necessary to employ an expert to examine any of the aforesaid books at the present time.

We recommend the District Attorney to dismiss the criminal charges now pending against certain parties for the violation of a certain ordinance of the Board of Supervisors, requiring the payment of a "sheep license."

We find that there is an inmate of the county hospital, named Mrs. Knok, whom, we are informed by the county physician, is a strong, able-bodied woman, and able to earn her living, and we therefore recommend that she be discharged from said hospital.

We hereby censure one R. S. Carrasco, Constable of the Fourth Township, County of Inyo, State of California, for a failure to perform his duty in a certain case wherein the People of the State of California are plaintiff and George Joshua Hammit is defendant, in which action a warrant was issued by the Justice of the Peace of said Township, for the arrest of the said Hammit, and which warrant, in disregard of his duty, said R. S. Carrasco failed to serve.

It has come to our knowledge that minors under the age of sixteen years are admitted into many of the liquor saloons in this county, and that persons under twenty-one years of age have been knowingly permitted to play at games of chance therein, and that the keepers of such saloons have been selling and delivering intoxicating liquors to minors, under eighteen years of age, all of which is contrary to law, and with a view to prevent the said abuses and transgressions of law, we hereby direct the attention of the several peace officers of this county to the provisions of Section 336 of the Penal Code, and of an act for the protection of children, and to punish certain wrongs to children, approved March 20, 1878, and of an act to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to minor children, approved March 11, 1891, and we insist and instruct the peace officers of this county that the provisions of said laws be diligently and rigidly enforced.

We further recommend that the Board of Supervisors cause to be erected two branch jails, one at Big Pine and one at Lone Pine, as in our opinion such is urgently needed at said places.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. H. BULPITT,
Foreman of Grand Jury.

Filed December 8, 1897.

Randsburg Notes.

J. Y. McClintock of Pomona has struck a large vein of low-grade smelting ore near Desert Springs, five miles west of Randsburg. He reports finding the remains of several old sluice boxes in that locality, which indicates that some placering has been done years ago in that locality.

Where eight months ago scarcely a hundred miners were employed, now over five hundred are working for $3 per day of eight hours each. New mines are opening up every week and the old ones in every instance are improving as depth is attained.

A Los Angeles firm is putting in a large pumping plant at Johannesburg, which will supply 100,000 gallons of water per day. The total capacity of the wells now aggregate upwards of 130,000 gallons daily.

Ballarat.

Montgomery Bros. have started a new camp on the Gold Note property, and also on the White Horse group.

At the World Beater and Star mines they are working twenty-five men, and are running the Bryant mill steadily.

Radcliff is working a number of men on his property and is taking out good good ore. The canyon is now looking better than at any other time.

Reports from Jail canyon are that the sale on the Hennerby & Curn property has fallen through. The property is considered to be number one, but has been bonded for too much money, and so the bonds have always been a failure.

Tubar canyon reports are that the Tubar Canyon Company will start to work within a week, and will put up a steam hoist and sink another hundred feet on the property.

There are a number of men at work there and all have good prospects.

The little three stamp mill at Ballarat is running steadily, and the town is improving. Prospectors are coming into the town every day from Randsburg and Mojave.

After hearing some friends continually praising Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, Curtis Fleck of Anaheim, California, purchased a bottle of it for his own use and is now as enthusiastic over its wonderful work as anyone can be. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Everybody is invited to inspect our beautiful line of Holiday Goods, Saturday' Dec. 11, 1897. NATHAN RHINE.

Gymnastic Club.

The young men about town are at work on the proposition of organizing a gymnastic club, and are likely to meet with good success. A hall will be rented permanently and fitted up with the latest gymnasium appliances. Tables will be supplied with the daily papers and the best weekly and monthly periodicals. The club will give social events, dances and other entertainments. It is a good idea and should meet with the enthusiastic support of all. It is proposed to have a juvenile department, and this is the best feature, as the little fellows now growing up will soon be the young men of the town, and the association with their elders in athletic sports will be a great benefit to them.

Take Your Choice.

Newspaper editors, excepting of course, Sam Davis, are proverbially truthful, rivaling even the legal fraternity in the virtue that helped to make Washington famous. As an example we clip the following from the Virginia Enterprise of December 2:

"John W. Mackey has closed the sale of the Blair mines at Silver Peak, the purchase price being one million dollars."

Great minds do not always run in the same channel. The Virginia Chronicle of the same date says:

"The sale of the Silver Peak mines to John W. Mackey has been declared off."

Even the Bodie Miner-Index of December 4 states:

"It comes from headquarters that John W. Mackay has purchased the Silver Peak mines for $1,000,000."

If Townsend got "it" from headquarters that settles the matter. We hope it came through safely and had a pleasant trip. Of course no one believe those San Francisco papers that stated, a week previous to the foregoing:

"John W. Mackay departs for the East this week, thence for Europe."

How to Prevent Pneumonia

At this time of the year a cold is very easily contracted, and if left to run its course without the aid of some reliable cough medicine is liable to result in that dread disease, pneumonia. We know of no better remedy to cure a cough or cold than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. We have used it quite extensively and it has always given entire satisfaction.—Olagah, Ind. Ter. Chief.

This is the only remedy that is known to be a certain preventive of pneumonia. Among the many thousands who have used it for colds and la grippe we have never yet learned of osingle case having resulted in pneumonia. Persons who have weak lungs or have reason to fear an attack of pneumonia should keep the remedy at hand. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

THE WORRY OF IT.

The world has come to know that the muscles have much to do with the health of the system, and the era of athletics has so developed them that the whole man is a stronger being than in former years. But the worry of it all is that the muscles are of the flesh, fleshy. A little twist, or slip, or jerk—these happen in all work—and then a sprain. Sprains disable and are costly in time and money, but not if St. Jacobs Oil is used, for it cures surely and promptly and the worry of it is over.

She Misunderstood.

Many singers fail to realize the importance of distinct enunciation, and the charm of a beautiful voice is often lost by the listener who is vainly struggling to catch the meaning of the song. A young woman who considers herself an admirable ballad singer one day received a severe shock from the criticism of an old lady who had formed one of her audience. Among other ballads the singer had rendered "Rory O'More" in her best style and had received much applause.

The old lady, who sat in the front seat in the little hall where the entertainment was given, looked at first puzzled and then distressed as the familiar song proceeded, and at the close of the concert she waited to speak to the young woman.

"My dear," she said in a quivering voice, "I remember when 'Rory O'More' first came out. I have never been a singer myself, but have always been interested in music, and I am sure I never heard the words as you sang them tonight. I am not deaf. My hearing is unusually good, but will you tell me where you get your authority for singing:

> He poulticed the hock,
> And she salted it down?

For, though I cannot remember the original words, I am sure they were not like that."

The young woman's face was crimson as she showed the old lady her copy of the song and pointed to the words:

> He bold as the hawk
> And she soft as the dawn.

LOWELL.

Called the Most Human Man In the Antislavery Struggle.

The world, says Woodrow Wilson in The Atlantic, is apt to esteem that man most human who has his qualities in a certain exaggeration, whose courage is passionate, whose generosity is without deliberation, whose just action is without premeditation, whose spirit runs toward its favorite objects with an infectious and reckless ardor, whose wisdom is no child of slow prudence. We love Achilles more than Diomedes, and Ulysses not at all. But these are standards left over from a ruder state of society. We should have passed by this time the Homeric stage of mind—should have heroes suited to our age. Nay, we have erected different standards and do make a different choice when we see in any man fulfillment of our real ideals.

Let a modern instance serve as test. Could any man hesitate to say that Abraham Lincoln was more human than William Lloyd Garrison? Does not every one know that it was the practical Free Soilers who made emancipation possible, and not the hot, impracticable abolitionists; that the country was infinitely more moved by Lincoln's temperate sagacity than by any man's enthusiasm, instinctively trusted the man who saw the whole situation and kept his balance, and instinctively held off from those who refused to see more than one thing?

We know how serviceable the intense and headlong agitator was in bringing to their feet men fit for action, but we feel uneasy while he lives and vouchsafe him our full sympathy only when he is dead. We know that the genial forces of nature which work daily, equably and without violence are infinitely more serviceable, infinitely more admirable, than the rude violence of the storm, however necessary or excellent the purification it may have wrought. Should we seek to name the most human man among those who led the nation to its struggle with slavery, and yet was no statesman, we should of course name Lowell. We know that his humor went further than any man's passion toward setting tolerant men a-tingle with the new impulses of the day. We naturally hold back from those who are intemperate and can never stop to smile and are deeply reassured to see a twinkle in a reformer's eye. We are glad to see earnest men laugh. It breaks the strain.

CHEERED THE CENSOR.

How a Gallant Irish Regiment Took an After Battle Scolding.

The leading regiment of our column was the Fifty-third, commanded that day by Major Payn, afterward General Sir William Payn, K. C. B., a very fine regiment, who, being mostly Irishmen, were eager to meet their enemy. Meanwhile I received orders to cross the river by a ford and get round the enemy's right flank, and had gone for this purpose, and was crossing about a quarter of a mile lower down, when suddenly I heard loud cheering and a heavy musketry fire, and then I saw our troops gallantly advancing across the bridge to the assault. It turned out to be the Fifty-third, who, tired of the delay under fire, and, it was whispered, hearing that Sir Colin had sent for his pet Highlanders to take the bridge, took their bits between their teeth and without any further orders determined to rush the bridge themselves—which they accordingly did, and with great success. The enemy, once forced out of their position, showed but a poor desultory fight, and, as at Cawnpur, fell an easy prey to the cavalry, who, having crossed, some by the bridge, and others, including myself, by the ford, fell on them and pursued them with such success that we captured every gun they had.

The Fifty-third were well pleased with themselves and the result of the fight they had so suddenly initiated. But we heard that Sir Colin was greatly annoyed with them, and after the action rated them soundly for their insubordination. But little did these wild Irishmen care; they had had their fight, and a real good one, so far as they were concerned, and as Sir Colin concluded his speech of rebuke they gave him three cheers, and giving three cheets more for General Mansfield (Sir Colin's chief of the staff (who had formerly commanded their regiment), they quite upset the chief's equanimity, but at the same time cleared away his wrath.—"Old Memories," by General Sir Hugh Gough.

On a Tombstone.

In a French churchyard is a monument bearing an inscription of which the following is a translation: "Here lies Jean Pinto, the Spanish vocalist. When he reached heaven, he united his voice with the voices of the archangels. As soon as he heard him the Deity cried, 'Keep quiet, all you fellows, and let us hear alone the illustrious singer, Jean Pinto.'"

For Cleaning and Polishing Stoves mix finely-powdered black-lead to a paste with water in which a small amount of glue has been dissolved.

The bulb of an electric lamp should never be inclosed in any fabric. If wrapped in tissue paper so that no air can pass between it and the glass, the paper will soon be on fire.

Paper tiles are said to have numerous advantages over the ordinary ones, being lighter, harder, and also impervious to damp. Furthermore, they are nonconductors of heat and sound, and look better than the old kind.

Glass library shelves have recently been introduced in France. The edges are rounded. The glass is nearly inflexible, which gives it great advantage over wood. Its strength has been proved. It is more easily kept clean than other shelving. The appearance of the library is greatly enhanced. The book people who have used it are enthusiastic.

Sudden and great fluctuations in the level of water in wells in stormy weather, closely corresponding to the fluctuations in wind velocity recorded by Prof. Langley, have been observed by Dr. Romel Martini. This explains the popular tradition that bad weather may be predicted from the sudden rise and fall of wells. Curiously, however, small and rapid changes of barometers are more certain to affect wells than large changes.

Recent observations on the differences of color in different races of men are described in a French journal of anthropology by Monsieur Breul. It appears that the color of the skin depends upon a pigment contained in the deeper layers of the epidermis. This pigment, in the form of minute grains, is distributed in the same manner in all races, the only difference being in the color of the grains, which varies from black, through many lighter shades, up to light yellow.

In Spain, where the telephone is largely used in place of the telegraph, says Monsieur Pierard, as reported in the Electrical World, an ingenious application of the phonograph to record the telephonic messages has been made. The receiving operator repeats the message into a phonograph, from which it can afterward be transcribed at leisure. This saves the delay caused by writing the message during its reception, and insures greater accuracy because the repetition of the message for the phonograph is heard, simultaneously, by the original sender at the other end of the line.

Many of the violent changes which occur under the surface of the sea, as Prof. John Milne has recently shown, produce effects that are distinctly and sometimes disastrously felt on the land. Wherever a profound cavity exists in the bed of the ocean near the land, and wherever the border of a continent slopes off into a deep sea, great slides are apt to occur, and these often cause earthquakes. In Japan, Mr. Milne says, a large number of earthquakes came from the deep sea off the mouth of the Tonegawa, the largest of the Japanese rivers. The river brings down alluvial detritus which is deposited on the brink of a deep hollow in the ocean, and from time to time the accumulated deposit slides into the depths, shaking not only the sea-bottom, but the adjacent land.

According to Nikola Tesla, as reported in Industries and Iron, "of all conceivable methods of generating electrical energy, nothing in the present nor in the future is likely to compare in facility and economy with the waterfall." Of all methods of generating power, the utilization of waterfall, he says, is the simplest and least wasteful. According to him, even if it were possible, by combining carbon in a battery, to convert the work of the chemical combination into electrical energy with very high economy, such mode of obtaining power, he thinks, would be no more than a mere makesmift, bound to be replaced sooner or later by a more perfect method which requires no consumption of any material whatever.

"With a view to rendering his operations really aseptic," says the Berlin correspondent of the Lancet, "Prof. Mikulicz of Breslau has taken to operating in gloves, and has published an account of the favorable results obtained after three months' experience. He uses fine thread gloves, which are made aseptic in steam in the same way as surgical bandages. Of course the hands are washed and disinfected in the usual manner before the gloves are put on. The gloves have to be changed several times during long operations; they are worn by the assistants as well. Prof. Mikulicz declares that none of the manipulations are rendered awkward or difficult by the gloves, and that, on the contrary, it is easier to take and keep hold of tissues in gloves than with the bare hand. He further recommends the use of a respirator of sterilized muslin, in order to avoid danger from mouth bacteria.

Authors Enjoying Mechanical Helps

The up-to-date stories about authors indicate that the brotherhood of the pen are as keenly alive to the advantages of a high state of civilization as any other class of people in the community. The author with a fountain pen which holds ink enough for about 10,000 words has made his appearance. His daily stint is the amount of ink in his pen, and when that is exhausted he stops; the author who has lost three months' work by the breaking of a phonograph, into which he had dictated a novel, has also come into publicity, and people feel as sorry for him as did the gay Frenchmen of a hundred and fifty years ago for the poet who lost a collection of blank rhymes. The author who keeps a phonograph by his bedside, in order not to lose the brilliant ideas that come to him in the silent watches of the night, and the magazine editor who, from his residence, dictates a lengthy and learned article through the telephone to a shorthand writer at his office are all with us, for the authors are evidently not the kind of people to lag behind the age in which they live.

A PECULIAR EXPLOIT.

Towed a Large Turtle Twelve Miles Through the Water.

Jim Westover, a youngster of 21, and a rider of the "bike," is the hero in the region about Mayport, Fla., just at present over the capture of a huge turtle the other night on the beach. Westover had been down on the beach taking a spin and also to see about some cows in a pasture at Six-Mile Point. He had a rope about fifty feet long that he took with him to do some measuring on some camp meeting lots. Knowing that this was the time for turtles to be laying their eggs, they affecting moonlight nights for such exercise, he kept a sharp lookout for them. Just after passing Pablo he saw the big outlines of something black up the beach.

"By Jimminy," said Jim under his breath, "that's a dog-goned big un, too."

Riding so slowly, he soon came near the big turtle, which was too busy laying eggs to notice Jim's noiseless approach. Jim cogitated over the matter for a few minutes and then, taking his rope, carefully fastened it to the turtle's front flipper and drew the rope tight. No sooner did the turtle feel this than it started up and wiggled toward the water. Jim mounted his wheel and tried to ride off the other way. Jim pedaled and pedaled, but could not move the old fellow. The turtle seemed to have the best of the bargain and pulled the unwilling wheelman to the water's edge. Jim was getting anxious. As the turtle entered the water he started up the beach alongside the water's edge, trying to get a new pull on his capture.

To his great surprise and delight he found that he had the turtle foul. The old fellow was at home in the water, but having his right flipper caught by the tow rope he was powerless to run away, and fight as hard as he could he could not escape. Jim started up the beach as near the water's edge as he could ride, and began to tow the turtle to Mayport. The turtle naturally objected and sheered out to sea. But the rope being attached to his landside flipper it kept him at just the right distance from the shore and he towed as easy as a log, as Jim said afterward. Once in a while he got obstreperous and twice Jim fell into the water, but by midnight he and his prize arrived off Commanche Point. His wild whoops aroused the neighbors, who came out to see what was up. They would not believe that Jim had towed the turtle for twelve miles in this way, until he showed them the rope and then to show off towed the big fellow up and in front of the town for a few turns. And the turtle had gotten used to it now and kept just far out enough to make towing easy. When he saw Jim turn to come back, after going up the bank a little ways, the turtle turned around and shifted the rope to his landside flipper again, as he knew that he could not be towed if the rope was on the outside. Jim has the turtle in a crawl near his house and every evening he takes him for a tow along the banks.—Chicago Chronicle.

Rare Packs of Cards.

The oldest pack of cards found in the United States is a deck which was discovered in perfect condition in a closet in an ancient house in New Jersey. The date of the pack is of the time of Charles I., and the cards are of English make. Some very old playing cards have been found in the board bindings of early books. It looks as if illustrative art was used in the making of cards even before the pictures in books of religion, which shows that man thought more of his amusement than of the saving of his soul. At a recent sale in London some old playing cards were disposed of. A geographical pack, 1675, with the rare explanatory card describing other packs of the period, brought £3; a pack of old proverb cards, not in the British museum catalogue, £4 11s; Dutch satirical cards, first quarter of the eighteenth century, with the two supplemental cards, £3 18s; a pack of grotesque cards, the suits cleverly designed and colored, £2 10s; a pack illustrating the American civil war, with portraits of the generals engaged therein, £2 2s; and the rare popish plot pack, published in 1679, one card missing, £2 18s.—Collector.

Seals Love Music.

The well-known love of seals for musical sounds often leads to their destruction. When the Eskimo hunter sees none of his prey about he begins whistling, and sooner or later is sure to attract an appreciative seal within reach of his harpoon. Lying at full length at the edge of the ice he continues whistling low, plaintive, calling notes, and presently a few of the animals will draw near to the spot, lifting themselves as high as they can out of the water, and slowly moving their heads to and fro, as if keeping time to the music. By and by one seal, more daring than its fellows, will come very close to the hunter, who then jumps to his feet and slays the creature, while its mates make off as quickly as possible.—Pearson's Weekly.

Japanese Industry.

The Japanese think the best missionary they can send to Formosa is the locomotive, and they propose to civilize its 500,000 fierce inhabitants by building railroads, which will furnish transportation for the sugar, tobacco, rice, corn, tea, camphor, cinnamon, pepper and tropical fruits which flourish luxuriously in nearly the same latitude as the Sandwich Islands.

The Japanese Government iron foundry now in course of construction at Yedamitsu in the Oga district will turn out 60,000 tons of steel yearly.

France's Consumption of Alcohol.

A learned professor at Geneva, Switzerland, states that France drinks more alcohol annually than any other nation in Europe. His calculation is based on the percentage of alcoholic liquors consumed. According to this standard each person in France drinks thirteen quarts of alcohol in many more quarts of wines, beers, etc., in the course of a year.

A GREAT GAME PARK.

Twenty-six Thousand Acres for a Preserve.

G. T. Ferris contributes an article on "Wild Animals in a New England Game Park" to the October Century. Mr. Ferris says, in describing the late Austin Corbin's New Hampshire preserve:

Blue Mountain Forest Park, as the preserve is called, includes parts of four townships, and lies near the enterprising borough of Newport on the Concord and Claremont branch of the Boston and Maine Railroad. It is said to be the biggest game park in the world, except one owned by the Duke of Sutherland in Scotland, and one or two royal demesnes on the continent. Of course, in making comparisons, one must exclude those immense public preserves, as big as provinces, where the British Government of India seeks to save the elephant from extinction, and our own national parks in the West.

The name of Blue Mountain attaches to the entire spur of hills which bisects the park, while Croydon designates its highest shoulder rising to the height of nearly three thousand feet. The steep and densely wooded heights of Croydon, curving like a hump, break the sky-line in the shape of a camel's back; near by a skirting canyon opens a carriage route across the mountain. In characteristics it belongs rather to the Green Mountain than to the White Mountain range, though it seems disconected from both. The verdure of an immense forest of spruce, fir, hemlock, pine, birch, beech and maple infolds it to the very crest, with here and there a brown patch of clearing. The greater part of the Corbin inclosure consists of abandoned farms, many of them already beginning to bristle with saplings; for the woods are on the march. Dismantled houses with windows and doors gaping like holes in a skull, ramshackle barns rotten and weather-stained, the wreck of stone fences thickset with brambles—these meet the eye at every turn.

The general outline of the park is that of an ellipse with respective diameters of about four and a half and eleven miles, and the surface is cut diagonally by a backbone of mountain running northeast. The lower slopes and the meadow levels are diversified with brooks and swamp land, while extensive groves of second growth profusely dot the surface. It is in these that the wild swine, the progenitors of which clashed their tusks against the boar-spears of mediaeval kings and barons, root and propagate their kind with a fecundity which is a marvel to the keepers.

One can scarcely grasp the bigness of the park by figures. But let the reader fancy a demense considerably more than double the size of Boston and all its suburbs; thirty times the area of Central Park, New York; almost ten times bigger than Fairmount Park, Philadelphia; or fourteen times the acreage of the whole park system of Chicago. Roads, many of them thoroughfares of days gone by, variously intersect the inclosure, and an excellent carriage track crosses the park from east to west through the picturesque notch. On the western side the declivity is more sloping and open, but has the same agreeable diversity of scene.

A wire fence, partly mesh, partly barbed, nearly eight feet in height and twenty-seven miles in circuit, confines the four-footed tenants within its steel barrier. The same posts which support the fence until the trees which have been set shall have grown to take their place, string a telephone connecting the nine sub-stations at the different gates with the central station, the home of the superintendent, the Corbin villa, and the town of Newport. The keepers and other employes of the park vary from twenty-five to fifty, according to the season of the year. It need scarcely be said that the needs of attendance compel a vigilance which never rests. Merely to watch the fence, lest it should have parted somewhere by accident or wanton malice, requires an inspection twice a week.

New Business.

There is already a distrust among wheelmen of the roadhouses which have repair shops running in connection with their bicycle racks, and there is one place in particular which has come to be regarded with suspicion by persons who have had their wheels suddenly fall victims to incapacity when least expected. One philanthropist who was anxious to ascertain if the grounds for his distrust were good several times submitted his wheel when it was in perfect condition to the care of the boys in charge of the racks. Every time it was injured. On Sunday one man found a cut plainly made by a sudden slash with a knife in a tire at this same place, and there were, within the experience of a very small circle of persons, several accidents of the same character. The result was that the man in charge of the repair shop was busy all day, and there was not a bicycle under his care that had not been handed over to the charge of the boys who watch the wheels left there by the guests. There are already a number of patrons of the place who are convinced that the boys in charge of the racks have some interest in seeing the repair shop prosper. This is conducted by a young man who runs it entirely on his own responsibility. With the rack fiends supposed to be at work on the approaches to the cycle path and the other parts of the suburbs beset with little danger to wheels, bicycling is taking on new terrors. But there is none of them more difficult to avoid than these accidents that are so closely connected with the attentions of the rack boys at the suburban roadhouse.

When It Happened.

"What time was it," asked the judge of the rural witness, "when this affair occurred?"

"Well, sir," replied the witness, "ef I don't disremember it wuz long er 'bout fodder-pullin' time."

"I mean," explained the judge, "what time of day?"

"It warn't no time of day, yer Honor, fur it wuz night time."

"And what time was that?"

"Well, sir, ef it warn't bedtime it wuz mighty close to 't."

Best Time to Sleep.

In view of the many changes which have been rung on the early to bed, early to rise idea, the following opinion from an eminent medical authority ought to be of interest. He takes up the old statement that an hour before midnight is worth two hours after and gives his opinion as follows: "I had an opportunity to make some study of this subject in my naval service during the late war. On shipboard, as is undoubtedly known to most of you, the ship's company—officers and men alike—stand four hour watches day and night, and to get the required amount of rest are obliged to get their sleep irregularly. To so arrange it that the same man shall not be obliged to take early or late watches continually, the 'dog watch' of two hours is interpolated, thus adding to the irregularity. In watching the results for over two years I could never discover that the watch, officers and men, were not as fully refreshed by their sleep as were the medical and pay officers, who stand no watch and have hours as regular as those of any householder." It seems to make but little difference to those who have given careful attention to this subject whether people sleep at one time or another, so that they get a sufficient amount of sleep.—New York Ledger.

TO WOMEN FROM

Mrs. Joseph Peterson, Warren, Pa.

"I have suffered with womb trouble over fifteen years. I had inflammation, enlargement, and displacement of the womb.

"The doctor wanted me to take treatments, but I had just begun taking Mrs. Pinkham's Compound, and my husband said I had better wait and see how much good that would do me. I was so sick when I began with her medicine, I could hardly be on my feet. I had the backache constantly, also headache, and was so dizzy. I could not walk around, and I could not lie down, for then my heart would beat so fast I would feel as though I was smothering. I had to sit up in bed nights in order to breathe. I was so weak I could not do anything. I have now taken several bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and used three packages of Sanative Wash, and can say I am perfectly cured. I do not think I could have lived long if Mrs. Pinkham's medicine had not helped me."

WHEN I WAS A BAREFOOT ROVER.

Oh, the spoil and greed in the world of men
And the strife that lives forever,
Are lost in the ways and dear old days
That the years can never sever.
I'd pass the haunts and marts of men,
And all its joys, moreover,
To live and dream one boyish dream
When I was a barefoot rover.

The shady lane, by the rip'ning grain,
And the meadows again to wander;
The willow'd rill beyond the hill,
To the pickerel pond "down yonder."
To lie in the cool of the shade and dream
My youthful dreams all over,
I'd give all the world has doled to me
To be a barefoot rover.

The bees and birds, the lowing herds,
The muddy cattle wallow;
The hollow stump where squirrels slunk
And the nuts in "chipmunk hollow;"
The faint, sweet smell from the ferny dell
Where the wild flow'rs used to hover,
And the woods, and brooks, and secret nooks
Were mine—a barefoot rover.

The chirp of birds, the lowing herds,
And the bumble bees' dull droning
Is music wall'd from the surging throng
With its never ceasing moaning.
And I'd pass the haunts and marts of men,
And its arts and joys, moreover,
To lie and dream one boyish dream
When I was a barefoot rover.

SAVED BY SHABBINESS

THE first great excitement of the opening of the civil war swept over the country like an irresistible tidal wave in that memorable year 1861, and I was caught in the current, though at college, and with nearly all my class enlisted among the first volunteers. My health not being very robust, instead of receiving orders for field service, I was commissioned to fill a place in a disbursement office.

One day I was summoned into the presence of my commanding officer and told I was to accompany Capt. McKey (we will call him) to a certain city for money to pay the troops. The sum was $160,000. We were given particular directions as to our going and coming. The distance was so great we were obliged to stay over night on the route. A large city was selected and we were advised as to the hotel.

When we reached our destination Capt. McKay produced an old black bag for our precious burden. It was not an ordinary old wornout bag—such a one as an officer might have used until the gloss was gone and the edges were white. There was no air of ancient respectability about it. Since it was new much time must have elapsed, and heavy wear must have been its portion, judging from the patches which were not of the same kind of shiny black leather as the primitive article.

The Captain carried the bag and I watched the Captain. When the numbers traveling admitted of it, I took a seat just behind him; otherwise we sat together.

I rather enjoyed hearing the comments of our fellow travelers on the Captain and his bag. One young lady said to her companion: "If that nice-looking captain has a wife she ought to be ashamed of herself for allowing her husband to carry such a furious looking old bag!"

A couple of lads returning from school took the seat vacated by the ladies, and after they were settled they commenced to look about them, and one said to the other: "What's that feller's rank?"

"Which one?" asked his companion. "The one with the bag?" After studying some time he replied, "Brevet colonel, I believe."

"Brevet jack-a-napes!" exclaimed the first boy. "I believe he's a low-downer, something like an 'orderly' or an 'adjutant.'"

"No, sir-ree, sir; he's a 'brevet' of some kind. Didn't we have the explanation of 'brevet' the other day in class as a commission which entitles an officer to rank above his pay? Now that feller ranks above his pay, which accounts for his uniform's being first-class, for Uncle Sam settles the bills. But his pay does not allow him to have other nice things—like bags and things."

Aside from remarks, we met with no adventure, and reached the hotel where we were to spend the night about 9 in the evening. We had determined to avoid exciting remarks by making unnecessary requirements about our room, so simply asking for a room in the quiet part of the hotel where we could sleep in the morning, we were shown to one of a suite. We realized we had made a mistake in this particular when we were alone, and commenced to make plans for barricading, as the room had three doors to be looked after.

"Now what will we do to the windows?" asked Capt. McKay, as we stood in our shirt sleeves, all heated from our exertions of moving a heavy mahogany bedstead without rollers in front of one door, a marble-topped washstand in front of another and a marble-topped bureau (also without casters) in front of the third.

I considered myself something of a genius about a house, so I replied cheerfully: "I think I can fix the windows all right."

I took the chairs and the towel rack, some empty pasteboard boxes found in the closet and a bamboo whatnot and erected a pyramid between the windows. My idea was to construct an easily moved something so that anyone trying to enter by the window would give premonitory symptoms by a grand overthrow. The pyramid not being high enough, I bethought me of the window shades. An unfortunate thought, for I lamed my thumb and skinned several fingers trying to get the shades down. But at length we stood in admiring silence before a pyramid that at its base took in both windows and at its summit, by the aid of the rolled up shades placed like an "A" to form an apex, reached nearly to the top of the room. We felt safe and retired for the night.

I was awakened by thinking a detachment of artillery and an avalanche from the Matterhorn were attempting to enter our windows at the same time. I gave a leap from the bed to ascertain what was the matter, when I found myself all enveloped in window shades (they having selected that pleasing moment to unwind after having rapped me awake.

Capt. McKay assured me that I made use of various strong expressions as I struggled to free myself. After the closest scrutiny, we could discover no trace of any attempt having been made to enter our room by the windows, but sundry movings about overhead led us to conclude our pyramid had received its overthrow from jars from that quarter.

"Morn, waked by the circling hours, with rosy hand," had scarcely unbarred the gates of light when I felt something more vigorous than a "rosy hand" hold of my shoulder, and opening my eyes I saw the Captain's face pale and distracted in front of mine and heard him say in a voice trembling with emotion: "The bag is gone!"

"It cannot be!" I cried, springing up in a frenzy of fear. But diligent search could not reveal its hiding place. There stood the heavy mahogany bed before one door, the washstand and bureau before the other two, undisturbed! The dust on the window ledges and sash seemed to prove that no one, not even the chambermaid, had interfered with them for some time.

"Let us get dressed and notify the authorities of our loss," cried the Captain in a hoarse whisper.

Both of us started to obey this suggestion and made such speed as we could, considering our oft-repeated tendencies to stop and search in probable and improbable nooks for the lost. I saw Capt. McKay pulling out the drawer in the bamboo whatnot, large enough to hold a writing pad with a few pencils; while I flew with a boot half-pulled on to search the top shelf in the closet.

"I have looked there six times!" the Captain called out. "I shall be forever disgraced," he added with a groan.

"And our brave boys, what will they do for their pay?" I said feebly—my imbecility showing itself in my alluding to such a painful view of the subject when the Captain was so overcome.

"Do you think I shall allow them to lose a cent?" he asked, almost fiercely. "No, sir! I have $1,000 in the bank and I'll use every bit of my pay and forfeit my pension to——"

Rap-a-tap—tap, came a summons to open the door, before which the heavy mahogany bed stood as an impenetrable fortification. I, with boot number one on and number two half on, and the Captain, with one arm in his vest, hastened to remove the obstruction with as little noise as possible, feeling we would rather not have it known how much we had barricaded. Several more raps came before we were ready, but at length we opened the door and in the dimness of a dark morning we saw a hall boy with a jug of water in one hand.

I took the water, while the Captain said in an excited tone: "Boy, run down quickly and tell the hotel clerk to come up here! Why don't you start?" he asked, impatiently.

"Yes, I'm going, mister, but fust let me ax ye if this here is yourn?" At that he held up his other hand and there we beheld the old, shabby, but inestimably precious bag!

The Captain nearly swooned with joy, while I had presence of mind to tell the boy not to send up the clerk and to give him a sum of money that made him whistle all the way down the hall. The boy explained that he picked up the bag just outside our door. Then we remembered when the lock of the door had proved refractory, the Captain had set it there, but neither of us had noticed that it was not picked up again. Blessed be shabbiness! we agreed, if it could accomplish the remarkable feat of preserving the sum of $160,000 in the hallway of a hotel so many hours.

When the Captain and I had sufficiently recovered from falling on each other's necks and weeping tears of joy over the recovery of our treasure, the Captain said: "I can trust you not to tell this, I am sure, for if you do, and it should reach the General's ears, it would mean the loss of my commission."

That is the reason I have waited until this time before giving the public this episode of the war—Orange Judd Farmer.

Revealed by the Microscope.

A ready means of distinguishing between fresh meat and that which has been frozen, a writer points out, is furnished by the microscope. A small quantity of the blood or meat juice is examined, and if this is from fresh flesh numerous red corpuscles normal in color and floating in clear serum are seen; while in the case of blood from flesh that has been preserved by freezing the corpuscles have dissolved in the serum, and not a single normal red corpuscle can be seen. The liquid must be examined before there has been any drying.

Young Indians as Farmers.

Out of 570 Indian boys and girls lately at the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle only 164 are there now. The other 406 are out among the farmers of the State helping to harvest the crops.

There is one thing that gets a man into more trouble than love; carrying a pistol, and looking for a fight.

DID you ever make the trip in a big steamer plying between St. Louis and New Orleans? The height of the season of 1897 has seen the usual pilgrimage of tourists, and the belles and beaux of many a river town have crowded the decks and staterooms of the soft-moving boats that float out from some city wharf, and drop anchor only after many days,

THE CAPTAIN.

1,250 miles away. At the very outset it is interesting to watch the roustabouts, tumbling over each other in the haste engendered by the hoarse voice of the mate, loading merchandise found for Southern ports. They are a curious study—these roustabouts—with their half-clad, powerful figures, their song-song cry of "heave-he ho-o!" their jog-trot shamble, and the reckless abandon with which their work is done. They have no cares. If they have any ambition it is to get the big steamer out of port, lie lazily on the lower decks, or play "craps," or sit and watch the white foam of the river as the boat plunges forward on its way.

When the last barrel, box and trunk is bestowed the big bell gives three taps, the captain, from the hurricane deck, shouts "Let her go, there!" the gangplanks are pulled in, the prow of the great steamer swings out and with a wide turn starts on its delightful pilgrimage. The captain is the patriarch and hero of the expedition. You can hear his big voice at all hours of the night, sometimes over your head, where he stands sentinel to see that all goes well; sometimes from the lower deck, where his vigorous and secular Anglo-Saxon arouses the mate and his roustabouts to duties engendered by new conditions; and oftener on the promenade deck, where he talks politics with the men and relates the history of each point of interest, a history which he has come to believe is faithful by reason of its repetition. Nobody knows when or where the captain sleeps. The cheerful buzz of his voice reaches your stateroom in the still night, and you drop off to sleep wondering if the captain ever does retire. When you wake in the morning there is the captain again, freshly-shaven, clean, bright and cheerful as ever, with an appetite for breakfast that only equals your own.

DANCE ON AN EXCURSION STEAMER.

While the Nile has been rolling along for ages in the same channel, the Mississippi has been roaming all over its valley, twisting hither and thither, building up banks and then cutting through them and suddenly abandoning the old channel for a new one. It is doing the same thing to-day. The vast length of the Mississippi and its tributaries, measuring 9,000 miles of navigable waters and draining an area of 1,244,000 square miles, must account in a large part for the great quantity of matter it cuts away, but even when these facts are considered the estimate must still appear enormous. It is stated by experts that the dirt carried down by the Mississippi in a single year amounts to a solid mass one mile square and 163 feet deep. This sediment is being constantly deposited along the shores and upon the bars and islands that abound in this remarkable stream.

The atmosphere of lazy floating days, on board a steamer, crammed full of unusual scenes, flashes of excitement grand and bewildering vistas of field and flood and verdure-clad hills, in which the beauties of the Hudson are duplicated, reproduced and excelled with enough scenic luxuriance to create a score of Hudson Rivers, cannot be expressed or indicated upon a newspaper page. It is altogether unique, and most of the people in this great, bustling country will never be able to enjoy the sensation in proper person.

The rafting industry is exclusive. It is not carried on before a grand stand or in the presence of a multitude. Its secrets are all its own, and one of these days the material exhausted, this industry will disappear with all of its traditions and romances, and with it will vanish from view the river types, the sturdy logger, the peculiarly northern roustabout or "rooster" as he is familiarly known, and the rugged captains who embody all the river lore and are walking encyclopedias of everything that belongs to the history of this great stream since the first Canadian voyagers and hardy French woodsmen penetrated these wilds.

One of these rafting steamers is a sight to see. It keeps its bows against the rear end of a mighty fabric of logs, in a position to push it down stream. A second steamer, smaller in size, is fastened transversely across the front end or bow of the raft, and is pushed along, quiet and unresisting, with its wheel motionless, as a sort of cut water for the unwieldy expanse of logs. But this is not its mission. A telephone connection is established between the two steamers by means of wires stretched across the raft, and as the rear steamer pushes the entire mass slowly and majestically down stream it soon becomes evident what the function of the bow steamer is. The tortuous course of the river requires a constant shifting in the head of the raft to keep it from going ashore or into cross currents, and this is the duty of the assisting steamer. Lying transversely across the river and attached firmly to the raft, a few revolutions of its wheel pushes the front end of the raft away from a dangerous bank, and by backing water the head of the raft is dragged back into the channel away from threatening shoals.

The difficulties of turning and twisting an invertebrate mass of logs in narrow and tortuous channels will be better appreciated when the actual size of the raft is understood. In length it is 1,200 feet, and thus equal to several average city blocks, and its width is almost 300 feet. More than half the raft is double decked, meaning that it is composed of two layers of logs, and it is estimated that not less than 10,000 logs are included within its booms, a number sufficient to yield more than 2,000,000 feet of lumber. Scores of freight trains would be required to transport the members of this inarticulate leviathan, whose weight is almost beyond computation.

TYPES ON A MISSISSIPPI RIVER EXCURSION.

RAFTING ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The passenger on a Mississippi River steamer is expected to spend most of the day in good weather on the promenade deck, with field or opera glass in hand, viewing the delightful scenery.

About the third day one begins to take interest in the landings. You want to know how long the boat will stop at the next town, and whether you can run up into the city and "stretch your legs." You try it once or twice, only to find that the Captain has hurried your return by a vigorous pull on the bell. This is one of the Captain's little jokes. He doesn't mean it, and as you wipe the perspiration from your brow he tells you how many points of interest you might have seen if only you had not foolishly run back to the boat.

The old days of the passenger steamer industry are a vivid memory with every river veteran—the high gambling days, those when every inch of steam was put to the danger point in a race between two stately flowing palaces. There is still lingering reminiscence here and there, suggestions of those brilliant, exciting hours, when life was a reckless whirl for the deck hand, and a thrilling experience for the passenger on a typical steamer. The gamblers, the grotesque dancers, the singing roustabouts, are nearly all gone, but the odd characters who have furnished themes for many a captivating story still haunt the landing places that one passes in a trip down the Mississippi River.

Immigration Figures.

The highest immigration record, excluding the arrivals of aliens not so classed, is that of 1882, when the prodigious number of 788,992 came, following the previous year's 669,431, till then unprecedented. In 1883 there was a heavy falling off to 603,322, and the decrease went on until 334,203 was reached in 1886. Then the tide again turned, and with some variations another climax was reached in 1892, when the figures were 623,084, the third highest mark, and not far behind that of 1881. But then began another ebb, with 502,917 in 1893, followed by 314,467, then 279,498, then by 343,267, and now this year by an astonishing reduction to 230,832, as shown by a special bulletin of the Treasury Department.

Substitute for Coal.

In the future we may be importing masut instead of exporting coal. Masut is a by-product in the distillation of raw petroleum. It is also manufactured from a cheap, brown coal found in Saxony. There has been, until recently, great trouble in finding a furnace suitable for burning it. It is now blown by steam into a special furnace, on the principle of the Lucigen light, and used without difficulty. It is 40 or 50 per cent. cheaper than coal, and is 20 per cent. better as a heat raiser. Steam can be got up quicker and kept at a higher pressure and more work be done by the machinery. From a naval point of view these are vitally important facts. No sign of a ship under full steam will be shown in the sky, for masut is a smokeless fuel. Russia and Italy are using it in their navies, and Germany has lately made some valuable experiments. At Kiel, Wilhelmshaven and Danzig are tanks from which it can be pumped into ships. Its specific gravity being so much less than that of coal, a ship's buoyancy is greatly increased when the bunkers are filled with it. Heavier armor or cargoes can be carried. The heating capacity being greater, the ship can travel faster or farther. It is yet to be learned what improvements the Germans have introduced into their furnaces and what are the disadvantages of masut.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Perfume from Living Plants.

Capt. Smee has discovered a method of gathering the scent of flowers as the plant is growing. He takes a glass funnel and heats the thin end over a spirit lamp. He then draws out the stem to a fine point. This accomplished, the funnel is filled with ice and placed on a retort stand, the pointed end being placed in a small glass bottle, without touching it. After this, the stand and the funnel are placed in a greenhouse, among the flowers whose odors it is desired to collect. Gradually the vapor rises from the flowers, and, in meeting the colder surface of the funnel, condenses into drops on the outside of the glass. From the point of condensation it trickles down until it drops into the bottle. In a surprisingly short time a large amount of perfume is collected, and it is claimed that 99 per cent. of the contents of the bottle is perfume; the rest is water. Strange to say, this essence of the flower needs to be adulterated with sprits of wine. Otherwise it would become sour and useless.—American Cultivator.

It Has Cost Millions.

The most expensive book ever published in the world is the official history of the war of the rebellion, which is now being issued by the United States Government at a cost up to date of $2,300,000. Of this amount nearly one-half has been paid for printing and binding, the remainder to be accounted for in salaries, rent, stationery and miscellaneous expenses, including the purchase of records from private individuals. In all probability it will take three years to complete the work, and an appropriation of $500,000 has been asked, making a total cost of nearly $3,000,000. The work will consist of 112 volumes.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17.....1897

One hundred dollar ore is said to have been found on Crook's mountain in Fresno county, but the report needs confirmation.

News comes from Colorado that the Utes are again slaughtering deer. In a day or two we will probably be informed that the Game Wardens are again slaughtering Utes.

Officers have just killed the three hundred and ninety-fourth member of "Black Jack's" gang reported to have met with that fate. Just how many regiments the desperado still has in the field is not stated.

The Argonaut mine on the mother lode near Jackson, Amador county, has started up milling its rock with results which indicate that it will be the third, and possibly the second mine in gold production in California. Since January, 1893, its present owners have been sinking a shaft that has now reached a depth of 1700 feet, the ore developing such richness that a forty stamp mill was erected. It was started up a week ago Monday and on the very first day cleaned up fifty pounds of amalgam, estimated to be worth $1200. When the inside batteries are well amalgamated only about a third comes out, but at first probably a half, so that a twenty-four hours' product of $2500 is counted on, which in a run of thirty days will amount to $75,000 a month. Only the Utica and possibly one other California gold mine are known to exceed these great figures, so that the Argonaut gives an almost assured promise of eclipsing all other competitors.

The Inyo Marble Quarries.

One of the most disheartening instances of the short-sighted manner in which business men of California promote their interests is found in the assault which has recently been made on the Inyo marble quarries. It seems that the granite men are dissatisfied because the new postoffice building at the corner of Seventh and Mission streets is going to be constructed entirely of marble. In order to prevent the erection at that point of an imposing public building they have prevailed upon the superintendent of the work to report to Washington that there is not sufficient marble at Inyo with which to do the work. The result is that the Inyo marble quarries have been given a decided black eye.

The statement is a slander pure and simple. There is enough marble in Inyo county to build a hundred buildings larger than the postoffice. In fact, it has long been known that these deposits are practically inexhaustible. Miles and miles of the most beautiful stone is visible on the surface, and the depth of the deposits will probably never be discovered. Yet in order to make a few dollars by the sale of granite, a slander has been circulated which years of effort will be consumed in refuting.

The moral to be deduced from this incident is the ancient one expressed in the phrase that "it is a dirty bird that befouls its own nest." The Inyo marble quarries are destined to become as famous as some of those in Italy. The time will come probably when their marble will be transported all over the United States. For them to be maligned in order that a combination of granite men shall be enabled to mar the beauty of a Government edifice in San Francisco is certainly something that is calculated to discourage all hopes of California ever being anything more than a nest of business centipedes who sting themselves and each other to death upon the slightest provocation.

If the press of San Francisco should do its duty, it would hunt down the authors of this slander and have them pelted with dead cats. They certainly ought to be known. No industry is safe from the assaults of men who have so little regard for the truth as to slander the capacity of their State to produce so necessary an article as marble. It would be no worse if a combination of peach-growers should inform the President of the United States that all prunes raised in the State of California were made out of clay.—San Francisco Post.

Making American Citizens.

In no country on the face of the globe is it so easy to become a citizen or a subject as in this. One must reside in England five years before applying to be made a subject, and the matter is then left to the arbitrary judgment of a department. France and Denmark each require ten years' residence, while Germany presents so many obstacles and so few inducements to citizenship, that few aliens apply for it.

Yet in one-third of the States of the American Union an alien is permitted to vote upon formally declaring his intention to become a citizen, and in some of these States no more than a six-months' residence is required before claiming this high privilege. It was established not long ago before a Congressional Committee that in many cases where a vote is permitted upon declaration of intention, the alien returns to his European home and never resumes his residence in the United States.

Not stopping to consider the irregularities and carelessness under which many foreigners have been admitted to citizenship, as where one judge left it all to his clerk, who used to swear in applicants in batches of forty and sixty at a drive, and in New York where 68,000 naturalizations were effected in a few months, the fact that it is so easy a task to take on the regalia of citizenship so far as residence and obligations are concerned, suggests the need for radical reform.

The system obtaining in sixteen States of the Union under which one may vote who simply files his intention is wrong. There is nothing to be said in defense of it that is at all tolerable. It permits aliens to take part in molding Government and its policies who have no permanents concern in the country, and have not proved that they entertain any abiding love for, or faith in American institutions. Indeed, our whole method of making citizens out of aliens is at loose ends, and demands severe correction, and demands severe correction, and that any amount of stiffening be put into it.—Sac. Union.

Lawyers in Congress.

The preponderance of lawyers is especially heavy in the membership of the present Congress. Of the eighty-nine members of the Senate sixty are lawyers of more or less renown. Of the 358 men elected to the House 245 are members of the bar. The account on this score in the two houses stands thus: Lawyers, 305; all others, 142. In other words, something over two-thirds of the membership of both branches of Congress are lawyers. There is one vacancy in each house at present.

This preponderance of lawyers is one of the heaviest ever known. The history of the legislative branch of the Government shows that members of the legal profession always have been particularly favored by the people in choosing lawmakers, and it would seem, from the ordinary view point of such matters that the statutes ought to be so perfect as to need no interpretation by the courts. Yet litigation is more flourishing in this country than in any other of the world. Nor does any other country depend so much upon lawyers for the making of its laws as does this. The parliaments of Europe are not now, and, without notable exceptions never have been, so dominated by lawyers. Old World legislators are chosen from every department of activity. Laborers, artisans, musicians, artists, cab drivers, men skilled and unskilled in the professions abound in the parliaments on the other side of the Atlantic. And we do not hear that the laws of Europe are any the less skillfully drawn than in the United States.

It may be that the lawyers in this country are more ambitious for parliamentary careers than are those of Europe, or that the people of the United States, for no apparent reason, prefer members of the bar as lawmakers to men in other callings. Whatever is the reason of the preponderance of the legal profession in our legislative bodies, the fact is obvious that this preponderance is increasing rather than decreasing. And it cannot be claimed that the statutes now show more wisdom or perfection than they did at the earlier stages of the Nation's history, when lawyers were not so much in evidence in the law-making bodies as at present.

Shakespeare and Dogs.

Shakespeare loved dogs and has paid them many a tribute. See, for instance, the graphic description of hounds in the dialogue between Theseus and Hippolyta in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (iv. 1, 108-132), and the talk of the hunters about the dogs in "The Taming of the Shrew" (ind. 1, 16-29), which are both too long for quotation here. In "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (i. 1, 96-104) Page defends his "fallow greyhound" against the criticisms of Slender and Shallow takes his part. Launce's praise of his dog Crab, though it was a worthless cur, in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," is also in point, to say nothing of minor references to dogs in the plays and poems. The passage in "Macbeth" (iii. 1, 92-101) says in substance that there are dogs and dogs, as there are men and men. The First Murderer has said, "We are men, my liege," and Macbeth replies:

Aye, in the catalogue ye go for men,
As hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs,
Shoughs, water rugs, and demiwolves are clepped
All by the name of dogs; the valued file
Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle,
The housekeeper, the hunter, every one
According to the gift which bounteous nature
Hath in him clos'd, whereby he does receive
Particular addition, from the bill
That writes them all alike, and so of men.

That is, in a general list of dogs we include all kinds, good, bad and indifferent, but "the valued file"—a list which classes them with reference to their value—distinguishes them according to their natural gifts or qualities, giving to each the "particular addition" (title, denomination, as often in Shakespeare) he deserves. Thus, "the housekeeper" (watchdog) and "the hunter" are superior to the "common cry of curs," etc.—Critic.

Cheerfulness In a Medicine.

Surprising recoveries occasionally happen which can be ascribed to no other cause than a cheerful state of mind and the healthful nervous influence which it diffuses through the frame. A singular but instructive instance fell under the observation of Sir Humphry Davy, when, early in life, he was assisting Dr. Beddoes in his experiments on the inhalation of nitrous oxide. Dr. Beddoes having inferred that the oxide must be a specific for palsy, a patient was selected for trial and placed under the care of Davy. Before administering the gas Davy inserted a small thermometer under the tongue of the patient to ascertain the temperature.

The paralytic man, wholly ignorant of the process to which he was to submit, but deeply impressed by Dr. Beddoes with the certainty of its success, no sooner felt the thermometer between his teeth than he concluded the talisman was in operation, and, in a burst of enthusiasm, declared that he already experienced the effects of its benign influence throughout his whole body. The opportunity was too tempting to be lost. Davy did nothing more, but desired his patient to return on the following day. The same ceremony was repeated, and the results followed, and at the end of a fortnight he was dismissed cured, no remedy of any kind except the thermometer having been used.—New York Ledger.

Randsburg Notes.

G. W. Campbell has taken the contract to sink the shaft on the Monkey Wrench seventy-five feet deeper. The shaft is already down one hundred feet. A whim is being put in position and will be ready for use next week.

The Johannesburg Reduction Works expect to start their ten stamp mill today for continuous business. They have erected a plant which is as good as any on the coast for the size, and this district can well be proud of it, and should give it the liberal patronage it deserves. It will make its first run on a 100-ton lot of ore from the Golden Bar mine.

F. A. Huntington, the manufacturer of the rotary quartz mill, arrived in town on Sunday from San Francisco, accompanied by J. S. Miller of that city. J. C. Ezzelle, a mining man from El Paso, Texas, who is associated with Mr. Huntington, met these gentlemen here on the invitation of Frank Cole, to look over the G. B. mine, which property they inspected and were so favorably impressed with it that they have taken a bond on it, $60,000 being the consideration named. Development work on this property will be pushed and if the mine shows up as is expected a quartz mill will be erected to work the ore.

After hearing some friends continually praising Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, Curtis Fleck of Anaheim, California, purchased a bottle of it for his own use and is now as enthusiastic over its wonderful work as anyone can be. NEWSY NOTES FROM BIG PINE.

BIG PINE, Dec. 14, 1897.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—This little favored spot of Inyo has the appearance and certain, sure indications of surviving the reign of the monarch of "hard times." The home nest of Dan Hall will soon be ready for "warming." Henry Bell's house is showing up rapidly under the striking influence of three builders. An interview with a staunch pillar of the M. E. Church—Comrade J. S. Graham of the White Mountain fruit ranch—developed the following as to the status of that institution. The trustee thus reported: The first funds were gathered at a bazaar held at the residence of Sister Alice Ober about two years ago; up to date there has been collected and applied to the erection of the Sanctuary $3166 41. This work has been done under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of Big Pine, and the shekels referred to have been contributed by both the saints and sinners, and if any ultra enthusiast of the male membership has publicly claimed that 20 saints had accomplished everything thereunto pertaining from basement to heaven-pointing steeple, the energetic society referred to desires the contradiction of this misstatement. Mr. Graham says that when the edifice is entirely completed it will show an expenditure of about $4000, and the aged veteran shows considerable pride at the prospects of the early completion of the banner temple of Inyo. Dave Werling of Fish Springs and Mr. Dunlap, a neighboring miner, report their claims in good shape at the present writing. Mr. Werling has done a prodigous amount of "dead" work on his claim, but has it opened thoroughly and expects it to be good for over $5 per day for all labor expended, and the old Mexican war veteran now ranks the outlook for his mine as equal to any on the hill. Mr. Archie Farrington has established headquarters at the A. P. Smith place at Alvord, and is opening winter campaign of wood delivery tp the C. & C. R. R. Co at the station. Jim Wallace will be captain of the ten-cord schooner which will make the first trip next week. Joe Watson, who has sojourned here for the past three years started to rejoin his family at Los Angeles yesterday. The Barhams, father and son, are now located on the Watson ranch near the old Boele farm. The elder Barham is a '49er and Mexican veteran, and while he shows the marks of pioneering, he is still hale and hearty. Mr. Barham is thoroughly posted on the condition of the other slope and its relation to our valley, and remarks, oracularly, that, in the inexorable sequence of things the patient dwellers thereof will surely reap their reward; he also has faith in the early coming of R. R. communication with the southland. O. P. Lowrey and family accompanied the Barhams to Big Pine, and are now living on the J. C. Crocker ranch. The hamlet will honor the coming reminder of the advent of the hero of "Peace on earth and good will to men" by giving the children a Christmas tree. Rumors are ripe of a baseball contest by the pupils of the Bishop and Big Pine schools during the approaching holidays. Both departments of our school are in good case and fair advancement will have been made by Christmas time.

The Sheep License Decision.

In the Supreme Court of the State of California. Department Two.

Inyo County vs. Erro. - - L. A. No. 292
Inyo County vs. Higoa - L. A. No. 293
Inyo County vs. Inda - - L. A. No. 294
Inyo County vs. Erraca - L. A. No. 595

These appeals were argued and submitted together. They involve the consideration of identical questions, and the evidence is substantially the same in each case. They may, therefore, be considered and disposed of together.

The appeals are from the judgments and from the orders denying defendants new trials.

The questions involved are: 1. The validity of an ordinance of Inyo county requiring the procurement of a license by "every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the county;" and, 2. The applicability of this ordinance under the evidence to the defendants.

It is first insisted that the ordinance is void on its face. Herein it is argued that under subdivision 27 of section 25 of the County Government Act of 1893 (Stats. of 1893, p. 358), Boards of Supervisors are authorized "to license for purposes of regulation and revenue all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on in such county; * * * to fix the rates of license tax upon the same, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise." The power to license is thus limited to lawful businesses "transacted and carried on" in the county, and it is urged that when the Supervisors imposed the license upon those engaged in the business, they exceeded their powers; for the words "transacted and carried on" it is contended are not equivalent to or synonymous with the words "engaged in." In ex parte Miranda, 73 Cal., 365, the County of El Dorado vs. Meiss, 109 Cal., 268, the ordinance under consideration were identical in language with the one here in question, and the validity of these ordinances was upheld; but against this it is said that the precise point now presented was not called to the attention of this court. Even so, we fail to see either force or cogency in the argument. It is difficult to conceive one being engaged in a business who does not transact or carry it on, and it is equally difficult to picture one transacting and carrying on a business who is not engaged in it.

The finding of the court as to each defendant was substantially the same and to the following effect: "That on the 27th day of April, 1895, and continuously thereafter until and including the 9th day of May, 1895, the defendant was engaged in the business of raising, herding and pasturing sheep in the said County of Inyo, * * * and did raise, graze and pasture said sheep and said lands within the said county upon the natural brush and vegetation growing therein." This finding is attacked and being unsupported by the evidence. By the evidence it was shown that the defendants pastured their sheep upon the natural brush and vegetation growing therein." This finding is attacked and being unsupported by the evidence. By the evidence it was shown that the defendants pastured their sheep during the winter months in Kern and perhaps in neighboring counties; that in the spring, feed being exhausted, they drove them into Inyo county from the south, and following generally the lines of the Sierra mountains continued the drive through Inyo county, a distance of about 140 miles into Mono county, where they were pastured during the summer months. It consumed from 19 to 27 days to drive the sheep from Inyo county, during which times the animals ranged over land of the United States and lived upon the natural herbage of the country. Over this there is no dispute. But upon the part of the defendants evidence was offered to show that the lands thus traversed were not grazing lands; that sheep men disliked exceedingly the necessity of driving their bands over such poor and waste country as that of Inyo county, but that the drives were made necessary to enable them to pass from their winter pastures to their summer feeding grounds in Mono county, and that it would be a benefit to sheep men and to their flocks if the latter could be lifted bodily from Kern county into Mono county without the need of driving across so long and desolate a strip of territory. But upon the part of plaintiff there was evidence that Inyo county was a part of the regular drive of the sheep men, and that the pasturage in the county was of exceeding value to the herds; that they came into Inyo county. It is further shown that the sheep are kept constantly moving in the mountain lands picking up their sustenance as they go; that Inyo county is one of the regular counties looked to for food by the sheep men in the annual movements and migrations of their flocks, and that hundreds of thousands of acres of land within the county are thus pastured by them. In the County of El Dorado vs. Meiss, 109 Cal., 268. It was held that an ordinance similar to this was not applicable to one who drove a band of sheep into the county, where they remained but for seven days upon the owner's land for purpose of shearing, but it was said: "Of course the license tax cannot be evaded by the mere pretence of driving sheep through a county or into a county for an alleged temporary purpose, when it is evident that the real object in so doing, and what is really done, is to graze and pasture the sheep in the county." The question then, being one of the purpose and intent with which the sheep are in the county, the determination of the real object must forever be a question of fact. In these cases the trial court found as a fact under conflicting evidence, and against their contention, that these defendants were engaged in raising, grazing, herding and pasturing their sheep in Inyo county. There is' of course, no question but that they were engaged in the business; the only question is whether they were engaged in that business in Inyo county, and the conclusion which the trial court reached on this question may not under the evidence presented here be disturbed.

The judgement ard orders appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Benton Mines.

W. S. Couch writes from Benton to the Inyo Register that four mines located last year by Indians through Mr. Couch are looking well and promise to become good paying property. The miners have organized a mining district to be known ps the Black Lake Mining District, starting at P. Geelhoed's house and running six miles west, thence six miles north, six miles east, six miles south to place of beginning. The mines lay about six miles northwest of Benton, in the sawmill range of mountains.

Black lake is only three miles from the mines. This lake will furnish plenty of water for milling purposes. An abundance of wood is on each and every mine in the district.

How to Prevent Pneumonia

At this time of the year a cold is very easily contracted, and if left to run its course without the aid of some reliable cough medicine is liable to result in that dread disease pneumonia. We know of no better remedy to cure a cough or cold than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. We have used it quite extensively and it has always given entire satisfaction.—Olagah, Ind. Ter. Chief.

This is the only remedy that is known to be a certain preventive of pneumonia. Among the many thousands who have used it for colds and la grippe we have never yet learned of osingle case having resulted in pneumonia. Persons who have weak lungs or have reason to fear an attack of pneumonia should keep the remedy at hand. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Edward Atkinson, the American statistician who knows so many things that are not true, is now to the front with the assertion that 'the average cost of mining silver all over the world is 25 cents per ounce." This assertion would make a Piute laugh. No man can anywhere determine the aggregate cost of silver mining. On the Comstock lode, where the richest silver mines in the world were found, every ounce of silver mined cost two dollars when a balance was struck from all the mines on the lode. It is only such as Mr. Atkinson, who start with intent to make figures fit their prejudiced beliefs who make such untrathful assertions.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

A SENSATION.

That the world is coming to an end suddenly at a given time is not what is here referred to. There are different kinds of sensations, as very many people know who feel sharp twinges of pain in the big nerve of the thigh. Sciatica is a very painful sensation, and the torment of it makes one think something is come to an end. But just at the first sensation or twinge is the best time to use St. Jacobs Oil. The less pain the more easily it is cured, and the Oil prevents its development by soothing the nerve. At any stage it will cure.

Costly Playing Cards.

A pack of cards was recently sold at a London stationer's for $600. It was one of the handsomest Italian copperplate card games called "tarocchi di Montegna," made during the fifteenth century. Another pack of cards recently sold at Paris for almost $400. Each of the cards in this pack is a master work of the engraver's art, and all the figures in the game were historical portraits. The queen of hearts, for instance, represented Queen Anne of England, the king of hearts being her husband, Prince George of Denmark. The queen of diamonds was Queen Anne Sophia of Denmark, the queen of clubs the then crown princess of Prussia, the wife of Frederick William I, and the queen of spades Princess Anna of Russia, later on the czarina. The jacks in this deck of cards represent the most prominent diplomats of Europe at the same time.—Philadelphia Record.

It is claimed in behalf of the Bermudas that the complexions of the natives are the finest in the world. This seems to be a clever advertisement of the Bermuda onion, of which 17,000,000 pounds are exported annually.

CLINTON'S MYSTERIOUS ....JUROR-DOCTOR....

Even as far back as 1870 Clinton was one of the most important interior towns of Missouri. Its people have always been hospitable to the stranger and encouraging to "newcomers." Therefore, when D. T. H. Morrison, young, handsome and skilled in his profession, sought a home in Clinton in the fall of 1870 and hung out his shingle, he was not pestered by the usual questions of curious old women as to whether or not he was married, nor by the often embarrassing inquiry of garrulous old men about his antecedents and prospects. In fact, nobody bothered Doctor Morrison with prying questions of any nature when he rented and handsomely fitted up an office in the principal building of the town. Everybody he met extended a warm welcome to him and hoped he would do well. Even the medical fraternity, headed by Doctor Britz, joined in welcoming Doctor Morrison to Clinton, and besides manifesting a natural interest to know from what college he had obtained his diploma, none of the doctors in competition with whom he was bound sooner or later to come annoyed him with questions about his former home or how long he had been practicing.

From the very first there was an air of mystery about Doctor Morrison which less gentle people than those of Clinton would have insisted upon penetrating. He was reserved in manner, answered politely but in monosyllables all questions asked of him, showed neither interest nor contempt for the affairs of others, kept a light burning in his office hours every night after even the night owls of the town had gone to bed, formed no companionships, yet was agreeable and always approachable, and in a thousand other ways deported himself in such a manner as would have excited to the point of frenzy the curiosity of the ordinary country town. Some of the more gossipy Clintonites predicted when Doctor Morrison first hung out his shingle that he wouldn't stay in the town long, for the reason that nearly all of the doctors then there except Doctor Britz "were almost starving to death." One of them tentatively remarked this to Doctor Morrison one day, and the Doctor only smiled and said something about "he supposed he would manage somehow to live."

Weeks rolled into months, and still not a citizen of Clinton or of Henry County called Doctor Morrison to attend a case of sickness. Still he continued to live at the principal hotel and to be the best dressed man in town. He wore a Prince Albert suit of black and a shimmering silk stovepipe hat. He paid all of his bills promptly, and asked nobody for the loan of a dollar. If he had an account at the bank there is no record of it. It is remembered that he bought four new suits a year, one for each season, though he always dressed in solemn black, and that the boy who cared for his horse and buggy always got his pay promptly. He attended all the meetings of the town and district medical societies and discoursed learnedly on the various phases of therapeutics. He was a regular attendant at church, showing no denominational bias and patronizing the fairs of all churches alike. His conduct was so genteel in all respects as to disarm prying curiosity, even if the people of Clinton had possessed their full share of that common human trait. His walk and talk were too conventional to give rise to unusual comment or to excite undue interest in him.

Doctor Morrison was permitted to live his life in Clinton as he saw fit to live it. As before remarked, nobody bothered him with questions about his past or future. Not a soul in the town except himself knew where he came from. In the course of a year Major Salmon observed that Doctor Morrison managed to get on every jury, except the grand jury, summoned in Henry County. He also noticed that every jury of which Doctor Morrison was a member returned verdicts that were declared by the lawyers to be the most surprising in the history of jurisprudence. The Major remarked this to Doctor Britz one day and that worthy gentleman said he was going to make a quiet investigation of Morrison "to see if anything was wrong." Both Major Salmon and Doctor Britz were busy men and didn't meet often. And so it happened that six months passed before the two were again brought together where it was convenient to discuss the case of Doctor Morrison. Then, when Major Salmon asked Doctor Britz if he had made any discovery with regard to Morrison the old doctor simply shook his head in oracle fashion and walked away without giving an answer.

A queer old character was Judge McBeth, who presided over the Common Pleas court. Judge McBeth was rugged and brusque and direct of speech. He did not permit the lawyers to circumlocute when examining a witness in his court. He made them go after the testimony by direct methods, and he pursued the same course in his examination of jurors. An important case, involving thousands of dollars, was before Judge McBeth for trial. When the jury was impaneled and sworn in Doctor Morrison was a member of it. When it was organized he was elected foreman. Nearly all of the juries on which he had previously served had honored him with the foremanship. The leading counsel for one side of the suit was Judge James B. Gantt, now a justice of the State Supreme Court. Judge Gantt had an acknowledged advantage over his adversary in having all of the evidence and the law on his side. Three days were consumed in the trial of the case. The jury deliberated on it twenty-four hours, and then returned a verdict against Judge Gantt's client. The court room was jammed when the verdict was announced, and everybody was astonished by it. Judge Gantt sat for a moment appalled. He was absolutely certain of winning the suit. So was everybody else who followed the trial. Judge McBeth had practically instructed the jury to find for Gantt's client. Nobody seemed more surprised than the trial judge, not even excepting Judge Gantt, when the verdict was announced the other way.

Behind Judge Gantt in the courtroom that morning sat Dr. Britz. "That verdict is atrocious," said Gantt to Britz in desperation, "and I cannot understand it."

"I understand it," replied Dr. Britz stoically.

"Then, in heaven's name, what is it?" replied Gantt.

"Why," nonchalantly responded Dr. Britz, "the foreman of the jury is crazy."

"Do you mean that?" anxiously inquired the lawyer.

"I do," solemnly answered the Doctor.

Without any more ado, Judge Gantt sprang to his feet and startled the crowded courtroom still more by moving for a new trial on the ground that the foreman of the jury was insane.

The motion was so unexpected that even Judge McBeth lost his equilibrium and asked Gantt if he meant what he said, and if he really knew what he had said.

"I do," replied Gantt. "I know exactly what I have said and I mean every word of it. I again charge that the foreman of the jury just discharged, Dr. T. H. Morrison, is insane."

Judge McBeth could not conceal his excitement. He squirmed uneasily in his big armchair for a moment, and then blurted out: "Dr. Morrison, come to the bar."

Slowly, and with measured, dignified tread, Dr. Morrison approached the bar. A cynical smile played over his immobile face. He stood like a statue, while Judge McBeth eyed him coldly for a minute.

Without any preliminaries, Judge McBeth brusquely inquired: "Are you crazy?"

Not a muscle of the accused man's face twitched. The smile left his countenance with the asking of the question and an expression of solemn dignity took its place.

"Certainly, I am not crazy, your Honor," calmly replied the strange young doctor.

"Morrison," again squealed the harsh voice of Judge McBeth, "What do you do for a living in this community, anyway? You say you are a doctor, but nobody has heard of you having a case since you came to Clinton, nearly two years ago. You are a mystery, and I want to know what your business is."

"ARE YOU CRAZY?"

"Well, your Honor, since that question has been asked me from the bench, I suppose I will have to answer it," was Morrison's unconscious comment. "If you demand officially to know what my business is, I don't mind telling you that I am a United States detective on the trail of a band of murderers. I have rounded four of them up here in Clinton, and am ready to put them in jail. I will have all the others within a week if you don't expose my mission here."

By this time Morrison's face was aflame and his eyes had in them that unmistakable glare of insanity. His splendid form was aquiver with excitement, which increased as he warmed up to his subject. Judge McBeth was quick to set aside the verdict of the jury and hastily adjourn court. Morrison retired to his office and locked himself in. That night he left Clinton as quietly and unostentatiously as he had entered it two years before. Nothing has been seen or heard of him since. That afternoon Dr. Britz told a crowd in the drug store of how a few months previously he had examined Morrison and discovered his insanity by asking him the very question which, when put by Judge McBeth, had set the strange young doctor off on his hobby.

And to this day the old citizens of Clinton who remember Morrison are still wondering how it was that he, being insane, exercised such a remarkable power over the minds of the jurors with whom he served. Some of them think that despite this insanity he was a hypnotist.

BIG ANTS USED IN SURGERY.

How Indians in Deep Brazilian Forests Sew Up a Wound.

Down in the Brazilian forests surgeons are not always at hand and hospitals fitted with modern surgical appliances are few and far between. But these facts do not bother the Brazilian Indian. For centuries he has known how to take care of himself, how to treat wounds and cuts and distempers without medical or surgical aid, and one of the most novel of these rude surgical customs is that of sewing up wounds with the aid of ants.

Septicaemia and pyaemia have been banished from the world of surgery in civilization almost entirely by the progress made in antiseptic methods and the introduction of anaesthetics in surgery has made possible operations which fifty years ago would not be dreamed of. But no surgeon, even of the most advanced school, left to himself in a Brazilian forest without instruments or appliances of any kind could care for a cut as neatly as do the Indians. The means employed is a species of very large ant, which is furnished with very powerful mandibles, capable of biting through almost anything. The insect has no sting and no swelling or other painful results follow its bite. Its lower lip is a strange jointed organ, which the ant has the power of projecting far beyond the upper lip on occasion. At its extremity it has a pair of powerful forceps, with which it can grasp and hold tenaciously small objects and nothing not encased in metal can resist their strength.

When the Indian receives a cut or wound from a knife or a thorn he proceeds to catch a number of these ants. Holding the lips of the wound close together, he applies the mouth of an ant to the edges and the insect at once bites through and holds on. Then the body of the ant is pinched off at the neck and the jaws remain fixed. Another and another ant is placed in position until there is a row of jaws along the wound, holding it firmly shut, and when it is healed the jaws are removed with a forceps or other instrument. This style of surgery is strictly antiseptic, since there are no evil after effects from the ants' jaws, and the bite itself does not cause any inconvenience, although the pain must be considerable at first.—Chicago Chronicle.

Electrical Power in America.

John Bogart, one of the American engineers connected with the work of completing the Niagara Falls electrical power works, gives to the Pall Mall Gazette of London some interesting facts in regard to electrical power in America. The Niagara company furnishes an electrical horse-power of 15,000 with a capacity for 40,000, and possibilities of increasing to any extent needed. The works cost $9,000,000, it having been necessary to construct a tunnel 7,000 feet long at a considerable depth and through solid rock. Of the utility of the work the fact that Buffalo and Niagara City are supplied at the rate of $20 per horse-power per annum, while in some cases nearly $100 per horse-power has been paid, is sufficient evidence. Next to the electrical works at Niagara are those at Sault Ste. Marie, and according to Mr. Bogart the greatest of all are in construction about sixty miles from Montreal, near the town of Massena, N. Y., close to the St. Lawrence River. The power will be obtained from a fall of forty feet between the southern branch of the St. Lawrence River and a small placid stream known as Grass River. A canal of a little more than three miles in length is in process of construction and when the works are completed a total of 75,000 electrical horse-power can be furnished. It seems a pity that the attention of engineers had not sooner been directed to this point on the St. Lawrence, as in that case probably the vicinity of Niagara Falls would not have been given over to manufacturing and thus become a great industrial center, as it will in the not distant future.

His Real Worth.

The spirit of thrift which pervades, or used to pervade, New England, is amusingly illustrated in a remark once made by a Vermont farmer.

He had been seriously ill in midsummer, but his strong constitution stood him in good stead and he quickly rallied. On being asked in the autumn how he was feeling, he said cheerfully:

"Oh, I'm fair to middling now, thank ye; but anyway it don't make so much difference, seeing the farm's pretty well slicked up. If I'd 'a' died in haying or harvesting time, it would have been full fifty dollars' damage to me." Then, after a thoughtful interval, he added: "Come to think of it, that's too low a figger—sixty dollars would be nearer!"

Power of the Press.—Wrongdoers stand more in fear of the newspaper than of all the anathemas of the churches.—Rev. Dr. Rylance, Episcopalian, New York City.

A Christian Sabbath.—We believe there is such a thing as a Christian Sabbath, but we should not try to restore a Puritanical Sabbath.—Rev. R. Thomas, Congregationalist, Boston, Mass.

God's Love.—God is not against man. He is a God of infinite love, compassion and mercy. He is more willing to save than we are to be saved.—Rev. John Mitchell, Methodist, Cleveland, Ohio.

Joys of Home.—A nagging wife may turn any home into a hell on earth. An irritable and unreasonable husband wreck an earthly paradise of a home.—Rev. W. B. Partridge, Baptist, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Grief.—There are a large number of griefs that are entirely unnecessary and self-imposed because of the inferior ends for which many live.—Rev. Geo. D. Baker, Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Pa.

Bugaboos.—I can no more believe in the existence of a devil than in the other bugaboos which have so long terrified or maddened us poor children of earth.—Charles Fleischer, Hebrew, Boston, Mass.

Death.—In the spiritual view death is of no consequence. It has no reality. God is the God of the living and not of the dead, for no man can die.—Rev. C. H. Eaton, Universalist, New York City.

A Protest Against Hell.—Universalism is the organized protest of the conscience against the abhorrent doctrine of future punishment. It is the protest against the traditional hell.—Rev. Heber Newton, Universalist, New York City.

Infidels.—The man who persistently casts doubt upon God and his word is the most subtle enemy to peace. I arraign such men and women as the enemies of order and prosperity.—Rev. Johnson Myers, Baptist, Chicago, Ill.

Hades.—If there is a heaven there is naturally a hell. One could not exist without the other, but the Bible does not teach of a brimstone hell, but merely by implication.—Rev. John W. Westlock, Christian Church, Omaha, Neb.

Eternal Life.—What is eternal life? It is heaven here in the soul; joy unspeakable and full of glory; an abiding assurance of the love and favor of God, and that all things work together for good to them that love him.—Rev. A. C. Morehouse, Methodist, New York City.

Dead Creeds.—Religion has life, while creed, with its external form and shape of religion, is dead. Religion, being alive, will grow to greater beauty and loftier heights; creeds, being artificial, can never grow.—Rev. U. S. Milburn, Universalist, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Destiny.—Man's belief in immortality is as old as the heart beat and as natural, too. This is the Bible's teaching about man. His origin is divine; his nature is spiritual; his position is regal; his destiny is immortal.—Rev. J. F. Carson, Methodist, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Devilry.—I do not believe that there is any worse devil that the wickedest man in the world, or any more powerful devil in God's universe than this worse man. Devilry is purely a human product.—Rev. C. A. Dickinson, Congregationalist, Boston, Mass.

Drink.—Intemperance is confined to no particular class. Among the lowest and the highest, the learned and the illiterate, those who live by manual labor and those who practice the liberal professions—everywhere we meet its victims.—Archbishop Riordan, Catholic, San Francisco, Cal.

Learning Style.

A lady, young in years and young in her work, writes the fashion articles for a monthly publication. She loves to talk of her work, especially to men, and the Chicago Tribune reports a recent conversation:

Recently a man was presented to her, and immediately was claimed by the young writer as a listener. He was attentive to every word, and having found such a listener, she began to tell him of her hopes and aspirations. It wouldn't be long, she felt sure, before she would be recognized as an authority on tulles and mousseline de soie, and she was hopeful that her articles would be copied far and wide.

The young man assured her that he thought fame would surely come, and then she told him that not only was she anxious to have good fashions, but also she wished to become a brilliant writer.

"Then, of course, you have read Herbert Spencer and Robert Louis Stevenson on style," he responded, with a laugh, thinking to help her out.

"Oh, no, I haven't, and I don't think I will need to. I go to the dry goods stores for mine."

Most Northerly Theater.

The farthest north theater in the world is undoubtedly that at Circle City, Alaska. Circle City is 898 miles north of Juneau, which is the best known Alaska town. The isolation of the region may be judged from the fact that it cost Casey Moran, the manager, $1 postage to send the letter containing a picture and the facts about his company to Juneau on its journey to the Clipper office. The Circle City theater is a variety house, with seven men and six women in its company of actors. The price of admission is $2.50, which does not indicate so much the exalted character of the entertainment as the high schedule of prices for everything which prevails at Circle City. The audiences are drawn for the most part from the neighboring fields.—Atlanta Constitution.

Same to All.

A small boy, the Rev. Dr. Lambuth relates, teased his father for a watch till he was forbidden to mention the matter again. At family prayers next morning, when asked for his Scripture verse, the youngster repeated, "What I say unto you, I say unto all—watch."—Chautauqua Assembly Herald

PASSING OF LORD FAUNTLEROY.

The Mother Tried to Be Brave When the Golden Curls Fell.

The scene was in a Ninth street barber shop and the time was a morning earlier in the week. The "tonsorial artist" nearest the door had just called out "Next!" when there entered a very pretty young woman leading by the hand a 4-year-old boy, with long, golden ringlets. He was a manly-looking little fellow, and his hair was just the shade of the young woman's, although she looked almost too young to be his mother.

"Are you the man who cut this little boy's bangs last time?" she asked.

"Yas'm; want em cut ag'in?"

"No, not this time. I want his hair cut short all over. And won't you try to cut each curl off separately, for I want to send some of them out of town and one to his grandmother."

She had a pasteboard box in her hand in which to take away the gold that was more precious to her than any that has come from Klondike. She said she wanted the little boy's hair cut. It was probably the lad's father who wanted it; she had only acquiesced.

Several of the ebony-hued artists gathered around to watch, while the lad took his seat in a big chair, as proud as Punch, for he was to be a "mother's little Lord Fauntleroy" no longer. He smiled, but there was a suspicious tremor about his mother's lips as she took a brush, and for the last time curled his beautiful ringlets about her slim and tapering finger.

Snip, snip! went the scissors, and one by one the curls were carefully laid away in the box. Before the last one was gone the young mother was huddled up in the bootblack's chair crying as if her heart would break. There was no doubt now that she was the child's mother. He was a baby no longer. It was much more comfortable for the child, and it was time it was done, and all that, but just the same he would never be mamma's little baby again, and she could not see the wealth of falling gold for tears in her eyes.

Not a man in the place smiled, and even the "Shine, mister," seemed to see a bit of pathos in the scene. The barber over in the corner had to stop a moment while the man he was shaving wiped a sudden tear from his own eye. The man, gray-haired and somewhat crusty, was thinking of a lock of gold tucked away in the back of his desk in a busy downtown office, and his memory had gone back to the time when he tucked that strand beneath his blue soldier's blouse and with musket on his shoulder had started for the front.

"Next!"—Washington Star.

Companions in Misery.

Good Americans who deplore the disappearance of their flag from the high seas are in position to derive such comfort as companionship affords from the predicament of France. There are two French government commissions now wrestling with the problem which have given out preliminary figures, though neither is yet ready with its report. It appears that in 1880 the French sailing vessels occupied a rank immediately after England, with a total of nearly 2,000,000 tons; ten years ago they had fallen to the sixth rank, and are now ninth, coming after Russia, Sweden and Greece. As regards the steamships carrying the French flag, notwithstanding the heavy subsidies granted to the great lines, France has fallen from the second rank, which it occupied in 1880, to the fifth rank, after the English, Germans, Italians and Dutch. While the tonnage of the steamships has increased since 1886 by 57 per cent. in England and 107 per cent. in Germany, in France it has undergone a contraction of 1 per cent.—New York Evening Sun.

Arctic Seasons.

The seasons in the north frigid zone or arctic circle follow the seasons in the north temperate zone, though, of course, about the pole and for 1,000 miles south of it in every direction the winters are much more severe and longer, while there is practically neither spring nor fall, three or four months of unseasonably warm weather considering the latitude, being what the residents in Alaska and Northern Siberia may expect. The equatorial regions have their wet and dry seasons, the change of seasons being usually accompanied by severe storms, which occur in September and March, often attaining the violence of hurricanes. What we call our winter is the dry and pleasant season in equatorial regions, both north and south, and our summer is, in the tropical zone, the rainy and unhealthy season.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Umbrellas.

Umbrellas will last much longer if, when they are wet they are placed handle downwards to dry; the moisture then runs from the edges of the frame and the material dries uniformly. If stood handle upwards, as is usually the case, all the moisture runs into the top of the umbrella and is kept there by the lining underneath the ring, consequently it takes a long time to dry, and injures the silk or other fabric with which the umbrella is covered. The latter is one of the chief causes of umbrellas wearing so soon at the top. Umbrella cases are not so much used as formerly, for these are responsible by their constant friction for the small holes in the fabric that appear very early. When not in use an umbrella should be left unrolled, and when wet should be left loose to dry.

Favored by Fortune.

The following well-authenticated anecdote furnishes an instance of a person attaining to wealth by what is called a "lucky" accident: A poor old woman who had long earned her livelihood by knitting, one day coming to the end of her ball of worsted, found it wound on a piece of newspaper, which she had the curiosity to read. To her astonishment she discovered it to contain an advertisement respecting herself, as the heir of a large property which, had she been unable to read, she might never have known anything about.

Killing Time by Shooting.

Jack—Suppose we patronize the merry-go-round, across the way.

Jack—That's a good revolver to kill time with.

WHY SO MANY REGULAR PHYSICIANS FAIL

To Cure Female Ills—Some True Reasons Why Mrs. Pinkham is More Successful Than the Family Doctors.

A woman is sick; some disease peculiar to her sex is fast developing in her system. She goes to her family physician and tells him a story, but not the whole story.

She holds something back, loses her head, becomes agitated, forgets what she wants to say, and finally conceals what she ought to have told, and thus completely mystifies the doctor.

Is it any wonder, therefore, that the doctor fails to cure the disease? Still, we cannot blame the woman, for it is very embarrassing to detail some of the symptoms of her suffering, even to her family physician.

It was for this reason that years ago Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., determined to step in and help her sex. Having had considerable experience in treating female ills with her Vegetable Compound, she encouraged the women of America to write to her for advice in regard to their complaints, and, being a woman, it was easy for her ailing sisters to pour into her ears every detail of their suffering. Over one hundred thousand women were successfully treated by Mrs. Pinkham last year. Such are the grand results of her experience.

MACARONI, ACCORDING TO MARIA DA PRATO.

Sweet macaroni, you must softly simmer
In savory bouillon till you're soft and mellow.
Then, blended like the notes of flute and 'cello,
The cheese is sprinkled—parmesan's bright glimmer,
With gruyere grated, unctuous and dimmer,
The whole a wondrous symphony in yellow.
At last served steaming to some lucky fellow,
With red tomato essence for a trimmer.

Such was ambrosia that the gods invented
For feasts Olympian, crowned with nectar thirst.
Great Jupiter himself essayed it first,
Then passed the dish, and Juno was contented
Double faced Janus, off guard for the nonce
Partook of it. He had two plates at once!

REACHED FAME AT A BOUND.

How the Famous Dialect Novelist Made His First Hit.

The man who had sprung into sudden prominence in the literary world had grown a trifle reminiscent under the influence of a good cigar and a small bottle, and one of the members of the party decided that there could be no better time to get the story of his remarkable success.

"I do not recall that any one ever became more suddenly famous in the literary world than you," suggested the curious one.

"I imagine that I came very close to breaking a record," replied the literary light.

"One day you were unknown, and the next day every literary critic in the country was singing your praise and people were standing in line to buy your books," continued the curious one.

"Quite true," admitted the literary light. "My reputation was made by a single story, and that story might be called an accident."

"That's what I want to get at," explained the curious one. "I want to hear the story of that story. Where did you get the idea and what impelled you to write it? What was your inspiration?"

The literary light laughed and reached for his glass.

"The secret of that story is soon told," he said as soon as the glass was empty. "You see, I had a typewriter."

"Young and pretty?" they all broke in.

"Machine, not operator," explained the literary light. "Machine was all I could afford at that time, and I had to get that on the installment plan. I ran it myself, you know."

"Well? Go on."

"One day I thoughtlessly went out without putting the cover on it, and my 5-year-old boy got at it."

"Couldn't run it, could he?" they asked.

"Of course not, but I'd let him help me put the paper in and take it out until he had mastered that much of the operation of the machine, and as the click of it pleased him and there was no one there to stop him he hammered away at it for about two hours."

"But what has that to do with your story?"

"That was the story," answered the literary light. "When I saw what he had done, I gatherred the pages together, numbered them, got up a title and sent the whole thing to a leading magazine with a note saying that it was a dialect story of a Scotch-Welsh settlement that got mixed up with the Dutch in South Africa, and—well, I haven't had to do a thing since then except buy typewriters for the boy. He's a little bit rough at times, but so long as he doesn't smash over one machine a month I can afford it."—Chicago Post.

Striking Effect of Climate.

Occasionally an eloquent testimonial to the virtues of a "health resort" fails to find a place in the printed matter sent out by the hotel keepers or others interested in the prosperity of the place.

A railway president who had gone to one of the summer resorts of the northwest to spend a few weeks was sitting on the veranda of a hotel enjoying the lake scenery and his cigar when he was accosted by a resident "boomer" with the remark:

"You'll find the air here full of ozone, sir. You'll sleep like a log. Before you have been here a week you will gain ten pounds or I miss my guess, and I'm generally right."

"I don't doubt it," replied the railway magnate. "I gained eight pounds the very first day."

"That beats the record," said the 'boomer,' slightly dazed, but recovering himself promptly, "though I've known instances almost equal to it."

"Yes," rejoined the other, "eight pounds. I weighed myself on a nickel in the slot machine at the railway station when I landed here, and the indicator pointed to 157. An hour later I stepped on the same kind of machine at the hotel, and the figure was 165. Gain of eight pounds in 60 minutes, sir, and I hadn't eaten a bite. Hadn't done anything but breathe this wonderful air. Never saw anything like it. Marvelous climate, sir—simply marvelous. And all it cost me was 10 cents."—Youth's Companion.

She Found Out.

A Boston lady stood on the deck of the little bump nosed Ocklawaha steamer in Florida, notebook and lorgnette in hand, asking ponderous questions of a darky roustabout.

"Is the alligator amphibious?" was one of her questions.

The darky scratched his head. He was a bit puzzled, as there had been more corn pone than dictionary in his bringing up, but his quick wit and natural logic did not desert him as he replied:

"I reckon he am, miss'. He done bite yo' shuah ef yo' monkey wid him."—New Orleans Picayune.

DUTY OF PARENTS.

Wise Guidance Needed For the Youth Who Is Leaving Childhood Behind.

"There is something pathetic in the struggle of the child to cast aside its child nature and put on the nature of manhood and womanhood," writes Florence Hull Winterburn in The Woman's Home Companion. "He is beset internally by misgivings even while he is urged on by ambition. He wants he scarce knows what, but something new and never before possessed. Perhaps, in a nutshell, the great desire of his soul is to be left somewhat to himself, yet with sympathy within call, and to be trusted. It is a great evidence of tact now for the mother or father to say, with a kind smile: 'Do what you think best about this matter, my son. You are old enough to judge what is right.' Happy responsibility! Delightful confidence! Influence is never stronger than when it withdraws slightly into the background, leaving its object apparently free. A good deal is said nowadays about the extraordinary freedom our children have. Seemingly it is so, but looking here and there an observer notes little real change among the average people.

"A young friend of mine whose happy married life has not yet driven from her memory a cramped and imbittered youth confided to me that the one idea that haunted her from 8 to 18 was that of running away from home. If she had been less conscientious, a little more reckless, what a gulf of ruin her innocent feet might have plunged into to escape the intolerable nagging and interference she was subject to in her father's house!

"We little know what effect our thoughtless and meaningless words of comment and chiding for every small matter that goes wrong produce upon the half grown girl and boy. They are apt to be reserved and to become sullen under restraints they dislike, and when this sullen attitude once sets in we may say farewell to all confidential intercourse between parent and child. To avert such an evil we will do well to apply all our powers of tact and kindness. Let us avoid arousing the spirit of perverseness that stirs in every young creature at this period of life, and, by enlarging his opportunities for action as his ambition extends, soothe any budding revolutionary ideas and inspire in him the trust and confidence in parental benevolence that will be his safeguard when he needs advice and assistance, for youth never stands in deeper need of wise guidance than at this time when there is a desire to dispense with it. But the guidance must be so wise, so tactful, so gentle, that even the most independent young soul will feel that love, and not force, is the motive power that draws him toward what is best, and that he is restrained by nothing except his own honor and trained sense of right."

POLITENESS NOT WANTED.

In the Case of the Elevator Man It Should Be Discouraged.

In view of the fact that the various petty employees of large corporations are usually not overburdened with politeness or consideration for the public, the complaint recently made against a passenger elevator man seems remarkable. It was alleged that the man was "too polite for safety." The man who was the subject of the complaint did what hundreds of elevator men do. When the elevator gets to the ground floor, the conductor usually steps out of the car to get a whiff of fresh air, to say a word to the hallman or possibly make inquiry about the ball game.

The hallman or starter shouts "Going up!" to the people coming into the hall, and the elevator man stands in front of the cage and politely asks his passengers to "step in," while he remains on the outside until the starter shouts "'L right!" Then he cuts his sentence short, steps into the cage, starts the elevator and slams the door after the ascent has begun.

Most persons "step in" when asked to do so, but occasionally a man with an eye to self preservation refuses to do so, and one of that class made the complaint. The man who insists on the elevator man being in the car before he will go in is usually looked upon by the man of many ups and downs as foolishly careful, but owners of buildings who are held responsible for the safety of their tenants while riding in the elevators are pleased to see them firm on that point. It may look well for a uniformed man to step aside and ask the passengers to precede him into the elevator cage, but many persons will agree with the man who made the complaint that it is a case of politeness which should be discouraged in the interest of safety.—New York Tribune.

Horse Model Makers.

"Making full sized models of horses is quite a distinct and well paid business, the models for the whole world almost being made in London," said the manager of a great firm of carriage builders in Long Acre.

"There is scarcely a considerable carriage builder or dealer anywhere who has not in his shop or warehouse one or more full sized models of horses (we and some other firms have respectively several such models always), which are not only used as a mere attraction, but are also, being movable, put into different sets of shafts, so as to show customers how a complete turnout will look.

"Then, again, extra good models are made for exhibitions, shows and the like, and many of the best harness makers in all countries keep them in their shops for trying on purposes.

"I have given as much as 60 and 70 guineas for a good model, but of course the general run of these things costs far less, except for exhibition purposes. I have seen models made of the skin of a real horse, but the imitation variety is the rule. The men who make the models—quite artists in their way, some of them—are also the sellers, as a rule."—Pearson's Weekly.

AMAZING VITALITY.

BULLETS AND SHELLS COULDN'T KILL JOHN PETERS.

Discharged From the Service as a Hopeless Cripple, He Recovered and Re-enlisted — Saved by a Noble Foe on the Field at Chancellorsville.

"Among the numerous instances of remarkable endurance and wonderful vitality of wounded soldiers that I had knowledge of during the late war," said a former hospital attendant, "I recall none so remarkable as that of John Peters. At the battle of Ball's Bluff he was a member of the Forty-second New York regiment. He was badly wounded in the hip, and he fell on the field. While he lay there another ball fractured his right knee joint. Utterly helpless, he was trampled beneath the feet of the contesting soldiers until the close of the engagement and was then taken prisoner to Richmond. He remained there four months, when he was exchanged and sent with other wounded to the Philadelphia hospital. I was an attendant there. Peters' wounds had been so carelessly attended to that he was worse off, if anything, than when he was first wounded. We did the best we could for him, but he was in such shape when able to leave the hospital that he was discharged from the service as permanently disabled.

"Some months afterward I was transferred to a hospital at Washington and was there when the battle of Chancellorsville was fought. Two weeks after that engagement a number of soldiers who had been wounded there were transferred from the hospital at Acquia Creek to the Washington hospital. Among the most desperately and apparently hopelessly wounded of these I was amazed to discover John Peters, the soldier who had left the Philadelphia hospital to pass officially as a lifelong cripple. When he was at last able to tell his story, I was still more amazed. After being discharged from the service as permanently disabled he had placed himself in charge of a noted surgeon of that day and after some months was made almost as sound as he ever was. At any rate he was able to re-enlist, which he did in the One Hundred and Fifteenth Pennsylvania and became orderly sergeant of his company. At Chancellorsville he was shot in the right thigh, the bullet causing a compound fracture, and almost at the same moment a minie ball struck him in the left hip and lodged there against the bone. He fell and attempted to rise. As he raised his head he was hit by a flying piece of shell, which fractured his skull and knocked him senseless.

"When Peters regained consciousness, his regiment had taken another position, and he lay there between two raking fires, bullets, cannon balls and shells whizzing over him for hours, until at last he managed to drag himself a few yards away to the bank of a stream where there were bushes. Grasping a bush, he pulled himself over the bank and let himself down into the water, waist deep, which relieved his pain. Our troops retreated soon after that, and the Confederate army swept by where Peters hung. After it had passed Peters endeavored to draw himself out of the stream to the bank, in hope that he might be picked up, but he found that the bush to which he clung, while sufficient to support him as he crouched in the water, was not stiff enough to bear his weight in efforts to pull himself up on the bank. There was a bush just below him evidently strong enough to enable him to accomplish his purpose, but it was out of his reach, and if he released his hold on the bush that was supporting him to make the attempt to reach the stronger one he knew he would drop helpless in the stream and drown.

"While he was thus facing death he saw a movement on the bank, and the next moment an emaciated face with a deathlike pallor on it appeared over the edge. It was the unmistakable face of a badly wounded Confederate soldier who was dragging himself to the water. The sunken eyes fell on Peters, and the owner of them must have comprehended instantly Peters' peril, for he dragged his body forward and, placing both hands on the bush that Peters longed for, bent it down toward his helpless foe and gasped:

"'Huyh, Yank, grab it!'

"The bush dipped so close to Peters that he summoned all the little strength he had left, let go the bush he was holding to and grabbed at the other one. He caught it. It withstood his weight, and after a long and painful struggle he pulled himself by it to the top of the bank. As soon as he could recover breath enough he turned to the wounded Confederate, who lay quiet on the bank, to thank him for his kindness. The man was dead. His dying breath was spent in saving the life of a foe.

"Two days Peters dragged himself about that bloody field of battle before succor reached him. He had been reported dead in the list. He was sent to the Acquia creek hospital, but 11 days passed before his wounds were dressed. His case being decided to be hopeless, he was sent to the hospital at Washington. He was there a month, during which it was expected hourly that he would die, so desperate was his case. But he did not die, and I heard subsequently, having quit the hospital service, that he had been discharged from the hospital so much restored in health that he was preparing for a third enlistment. Whether he did enter the service again I never knew."—New York Sun.

ENGLISH INNKEEPERS.

Said to Be Mainly Boers Who Treat Patrons as Intruders.

If your pocketbook allows or fate or the desire to see the country compels you to remain in England, there are parts where you can ride on your wheel with great satisfaction and at great expense. Nothing could be more beautiful than the midlands, lovelier than the counties that surround London, but westward go no farther than Bristol or Truro, northward than Chester, avoiding Manchester—that is, unless you mean to go still farther north into Scotland, which at times will repay your enterprise. The southwest is largely to be avoided. Cornwall and Devon have the worst roads in civilized Europe—in fact, the roads and inns explain that the country is not and never has been civilized. In the inns you are often treated as an intruder, and sometimes cheated in a fashion that would bring a blush to the cheek of a Swiss landlord, for the emptiness of the larder the bill makes up in lavishness. There is hardly anything to eat save cream, but for that and salt bacon and ancient eggs you are asked to pay as much as for a good dinner at the Cafe Royal. The innkeepers are mainly boers.

As for the roads, they go straight to the top of all the hills, as uncompromisingly as the roads of Bohemia, then drop down the other side and are unridable in both directions. When not climbing precipitately, they lie buried at the bottom of a ditch. They are shadeless and uninteresting, rarely approaching the seacoast or passing near anything that is worth looking at, and yet we know Englishmen who are profoundly impressed with the belief that they are the best in England, and therefore in the world. The roads, inns and innkeepers of Scotland are in every way better, but the fact that the average Briton spends his holiday on the continent when he can proves not only that he wants to get there, but also that he is driven from his own country by the shortsightedness of the people who keep its inns and look after its roads.—Mr and Mrs. Pennell in Fortnightly Review.

ANCIENT MEDICAL METHODS

The Manner of Doctors' Consultations In the Fourteenth Century.

Coming to Mondeville's exposition of the method of holding a discussion, we find his description almost a story of what might take place today. "First," he says, "we should inquire into the nature of the disease, examining carefully and feeling, because the diagnosis is made by touching with the hand and observing with the eye. All the consultants engage in turn in the examination. Then, if the case demands it, they make a new examination all together, pointing out to one another the symptoms of disease and the special or remarkable features either in the patient or the disease. Then one of them, the highest in rank, says to the patient, 'Sir, we perceive very clearly what is the matter with you, and you ought to have full confidence in us and be glad that there are so many of us here and such doctors—enough for a king—and to believe that the youngest of us is competent to prescribe and carry on your treatment and bring it to a good result.' Then he interrogates the patient about the circumstances of his attack, 'Sir, do not be displeased or take it ill, but when did your illness begin?' following this with many other questions, the answers to which are recorded as indications furnished by the patient.

"When all the questions called for by the case have been asked, the consultants retire to another room, where they will be alone, for in all consultations the masters dispute with one another in order the better to discuss the truth, and sometimes they come to a pass in the heat of discussion which would cause strangers witnessing their proceeding to suppose there were discord and strife among them. This is sometimes the case."—"Fourteenth Century Doctors," by M. E. Nicaise, in Popular Science Monthly.

Mozart's Method.

Mozart's method of composition was such as could only have been pursued by a child of genius. He would rise early, eat a hearty breakfast and then stroll for several hours in a forest near his home, where, inspired by nature's beauties, heavenly melodies came trooping through his brain. Repairing to his cottage, he would summon his wife, a very witty woman, and bid her tell him stories. He would then mount his high stool and proceed to commit these inspirations to paper, his wife telling him jokes and funny stories while he wrote. These he enjoyed immensely, frequently interrupting her with hearty bursts of laughter and sometimes even falling from the stool and rolling on the floor. But amid all this hilarity and uproar the flow of music which was to move the world went steadily on. His productions were wrought without the least thought or study, but came almost unbidden "direct from heaven." Like Shakespeare, he was purely the creature of inspiration, a genius of the highest order.—C. C. Hieatt in Housekeeper.

Remote Ancestry.

"It has long been supposed," says The Outlook, "that the most startling genealogical claim is that of the negus of Abyssinia, who insists that his descent has been in a straight line from the union of Solomon with the queen of Sheba, but some one has discovered a noble family in France, the counts of Noe, who not only claim Noah as their remote ancestor, but show on their family blazon that veteran seaman in the ark."

Laying Bricks.

A bricklayer can lay about 1,500 or 1,600 bricks in a day of 10 hours where the joints are left rough, about 1,000 per day when both faces have to be worked fair and not more than 500 a day when carefully jointed and faced with picked bricks of a uniform color.—Exchange.

WAS GETTING EVEN.

A WAITER GIVES A CUSTOMER A LESSON IN IMPORTUNING.

The Man Didn't Want Anything but Pork and Beans and What Went With It, but the Waiter Called His Attention to Everything In the Place.

"Pork and beans? Yes, sir. Anything else?"

"No."

The waiter in the Madison street restaurant filled the order with alacrity.

"Did you say coffee, sir?" he asked as he placed the pork and beans before the hungry guest.

"No," replied the latter.

"You'll find our coffee very nice, sir."

"This bread and butter goes with the pork and, doesn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"And this glass of water?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Well, that's all I want."

"Yes, sir. Like to try a cup of our chocolate?"

"No. If I want anything else, I'll call for it."

The waiter stepped back, but returned presently to ask:

"Wouldn't you like to have me bring you some of our boneless codfish? It's the best in the country."

"No."

"How about roast turkey with stuffing?"

"Don't want any."

"It's first class."

"That's all right. I don't want it."

"I think you'd like our roast beef and browned potatoes."

"Didn't you hear me say that if I wanted anything else I would call for it?"

"Yes, sir."

The waiter stepped back again, but in a few moments returned to the attack.

"Excuse me for saying so, my friend, but you look as if you might be needing some kind of game. Suppose you try our jacksnipe on toast."

"Great Scott! Don't you reckon I know what I want?"

"Yes, sir. Our jacksnipe is fresh and good. Everybody needs to eat game once in awhile. Kind of tones up the system."

"I've told you I don't want any."

"Yes, sir. Rabbits ain't good this time of year or we'd have some rabbit. Squabs are about as good as wild game, though. Like to try a broiled squab on toast?"

"I'd like to eat my pork and beans in peace. Bring me some more water, will you?"

"Yes, sir. Shan't I bring you some iced tea?"

"Not any iced tea."

"It's very fine."

"Don't want it."

"It's good for some people; tones up the system."

"That's all right. Bring me that water, will you?"

"Yes, sir."

He went away and returned in an incredibly short space of time.

"Here's your water," he said, "but I think you'd find our iced coffee mighty fine."

The guest made no reply.

"Better let me bring you some iced coffee, sir."

"When I want any iced coffee or anything else, I'll let you know."

"Ever try any of our stewed mushrooms?"

"No, and I don't want to try any of your stewed mushrooms either."

"You needn't be afraid of them, sir. They're all right. We guarantee them, and there ain't any better in the United States."

"I don't—"

"Some people, you know, are afraid of mushrooms. Ours are selected with great care. The man we get our mushrooms from is an expert. He raises 'em scientifically"—

"Say, do you know you're a confounded nuisance?"

"I hope not, sir. I'm only trying your own way of doing business on you."

"What do you mean?"

"You run a barber shop on State street, don't you?"

"Yes. What of that?"

"You have the chair next to the front door, I think?"

"Yes."

"Well, I went to your shop last Saturday to get a shave. You shaved me. You tried to get me to have my hair cut. You told me I ought to have a shampoo. You said my hair needed singeing. You wanted to know if I hadn't better have some tonic or bay rum. You wanted to sell me a special shaving mug and brush. You bored me every minute you were shaving me, and I said to myself that if I ever got a chance at you I'd even up things. I didn't expect you quite so soon, though. Say, we're about even, ain't we?"

"We'll be a little more than even when I tell your boss about your dog-goned impudence"—

"I guess you won't do that. There's a dozen of us that get shaved at your shop. You go to making any trouble and you'll lose the lot of us. You'd better take your medicine like a little—Going, are you? Well, come again. Treat you all right next time."—Chicago Tribune.

A RIGHT ROYAL ROBE.

Made of Rare Feathers For the Ruler of the Sandwich Islands.

A million dollars seems a pretty round sum to pay for a cloak, and probably even Worth never dreamed of asking so fabulous a price for the most elaborate of his garments. And yet in the National museum at Washington is a cloak the cost of which cannot be reckoned at less than this vast amount, and ladies may be pleased to learn that it was not a woman, but a man, who was guilty of such a piece of extravagance.

Long years ago, when the Hawaiian Islands, small as they are, supported not one but several flourishing kingdoms, the kings, chiefs and nobles, whenever they appeared in public on state occasions, wore, instead of the purple and ermine of more civilized potentates, capes and cloaks of brilliant feathers. The ladies of the court were forced to content themselves with feather boas, as we should call them, known as leis. These capes and collars were made from the yellow, red and black feathers of a few species of small birds peculiar to the Sandwich Islands and called, from their habits, honey suckers. Fashion ruled even in those days, and as the yellow feathers were scarcer than the red yellow was the fashionable color, and the more powerful the chief the more yellow was his robe of state. These yellow feathers were found only on two or three species of birds, the finest coming from a bird called in the native language mamo and known as Drepanis pacifica by ornithologists.

These birds, with their striking black and yellow plumage, were as dear to the hearts of the Hawaiian monarchs as they might be today to the hearts of patriotic Princeton students and were sought for far and near throughout the islands. The populace paid poll taxes in golden feathers instead of golden dollars, and as each bird furnished but a few feathers the taxes may be considered as having been high. Some estimate of the value of the feathers may be formed from the prices paid in later times, when a piece of nankeen cloth valued at $1.50 was the equivalent of five feathers; but, after all, the great element in the cost of these cloaks was time and labor, since the making of a single cloak required from 50 to 100 years.

As the feathers obtained for taxes were very far from supplying the demand the chiefs were accustomed to employ a regular staff of bird catchers, much as a mediæval baron had his staff of falconers. These skilled foresters prepared a sort of bird lime from the gum of the fragrant olapa, mixed with the juice of the breadfruit tree, and with it smeared the branches of the flowering trees frequented by the honey suckers.—Frederic A. Lucas in St. Nicholas.

METHOD IN HIS MADNESS.

Police Officers Who Humored a Man Found Out Their Error.

A tall, slim man, with a vacant stare, walked into the police station of a western city, stepped up to the officer on duty and said in a hollow voice:

"Sir, I have an important communication to make. I am dead. I was murdered, and I entreat you to find the murderer and have me buried."

The official started back. It was evident he had a lunatic before him. He rang a bell, and the captain of the division, the police surgeon and all the constables obeyed the summons. In a moment the room was packed with a crowd of persons, all anxiously looking toward the surgeon, who, in such cases, has the first word.

"Just so," the latter said, addressing the stranger. "I could tell at a glance you were dead. Do you happen to know your name?"

"Certainly," the maniac replied. "My name is Berthold Lenwarz."

"And your address?"

"The grave."

"Who is the murderer?"

"Columbus."

"The same as discovered America?"

"Yes."

"Then let me congratulate you. We have captured the smart chap. Come, I will show you to his cell."

"Directly," said the madman in reply to the surgeon's diplomatic little speech and began fumbling in his pocket, from which he quickly produced a thick packet of neatly bound almanacs. "Gentlemen, when I was alive, I used to sell these almanacs. They are the best sold in this country and only cost threepence each. You will admit that these handsome little volumes ought not to be left to molder in the grave, and, as we appear on such friendly terms, perhaps the gentlemen will not object to buy the lot."

Ten minutes later, almanacs all sold, he departed.—Scottish Nights.

At His Wits' End.

He sat in his office musing. "Now, here are two tickets for the theater tonight," he said. "If I ask Jones to go with me, I'm sure to find out when I get home to dinner that it's the only thing that's been here in a year that my wife really wants to see, and if I don't ask any one to go and plan to take her I'll learn when it's too late to make any change that nothing could hire her to sit through the old piece."

He puzzled his head over the question for an hour, and then he tossed up a quarter to decide what he would do, although he knew he would lose which over way it came.—Chicago Post.

Made Bread of Bones.

According to Herault, during the siege of Paris by Henry IV a famine raged and bread sold at a crown a pound. When this was consumed, the people, maddened with hunger, exhumed the dried bones from the charnel house of the Holy Innocents and from these made a kind of bread.

A public school system was put in operation in nearly all the provinces of the Roman empire in the year 98.

THE MONOTONE.

Hark! How the great, old ocean day and night
Breaks on you giant rock as on a throne
That towers in silent night
In one long, plaintive, awful monotone!

Unanswering ever towers the giant rock
Amid the centuries that come and go,
As if 'twould only mock
The eternal voice that wailed and wailed below.

'Tis thus, O God, the deep sea of my soul
Breaks ever on the foot of thy great throne,
Its dread but only goal,
In one long, plaintive, awful monotone!

Unanswered yet, but, hoping, still it calls:
Will not the throne take pity on the woe?
How terrible if its walls
Are always silent to the wail below!

A JOKER'S FAME.

Some Interesting Reminiscences of the Famous Humorist, Sydney Smith.

Sydney Smith was a political reformer and one of the foremost men of letters of his time, but he is remembered chiefly as a humorist who could enliven a dinner table with his wit. Like other wise men who have a talent for making people laugh, he was jealous of his reputation for good sense.

When he reprinted his essays from the Edinburgh Review, his object, given in his own words, was "to show, if I could, that I had not passed my life merely in making jokes, but that I had made use of whatever little powers of pleasantry I might be endowed with to discountenance bad and to encourage liberal and wise principles." In this object he failed. His public services and wisdom have been forgotten. His jokes are remembered.

His account of Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach at Sidmouth and who was seen during a violent storm trundling her mop, squeezing out the sea water and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic ocean, is a household story which every one knows. The circumstances in which it was told and the effect produced by it have passed out of mind.

It was at the end of a long agitation for political reform in England when the house of lords had thrown out the great measure of Lord John Russell, which had been carried through the commons. Sydney Smith, the political parson who had been advocating Liberal principles and reform measures for many years, told this story at a political meeting in Taunton, at which speeches were made protesting against the action of the lords. It caught the public fancy, and within a week everybody in England was laughing over it. Mrs. Partington's mop battle with the tempest tossed Atlantic portrayed the lords' futile struggle with English public opinion. That funny story was probably more effective than the most eloquent argument in disarming mobs, preventing a breach of the peace and converting hostility to the lords into good natured contempt. "The Atlantic ocean beat Mrs. Partington."

During the 60 years which preceded the Victorian reign Sydney Smith was almost the only prominent English clergyman who was interested in reform movements, and in his writings for the Edinburgh Review he succeeded by his wit in presenting the dullest argument with freshness and force. Wit with him was the vehicle which carried good sense and wisdom. He has been in his grave 60 years, and his reputation is that of a clerical joker.

He expected that a tablet would be erected to his memory in St. Paul's cathedral, London, where as canon he was a favorite preacher at the close of his life. There is no memorial tablet there, nor is there one at either Foston or Combe-Florey, the two parishes where most of his work was done. His jokes have survived not only his writings, but his services as a reformer who loved religious toleration and political liberty as the breath of his life.

What his career proves is that wit is one of the most powerful weapons in the world. Without it he would have exerted very much less influence as a writer or a preacher in politics. With it his name has been handed down as one of the great Englishmen of his time.

Ranch Life.

It is so difficult to imagine a young American voluntarily choosing a ranch as a start in life that it is hardly worth while trying to do so. As a rule he either thinks of the country as the place where market vegetables come from and Thanksgiving turkeys are raised, or else it represents to him a large and expensive establishment at Lakewood or some such place, with a casino and bowling alley and polo team attached. And as for the most part the American does not play polo nor hunt nor shoot nor fish with any real, genuine enthusiasm, the latter view he takes is scarcely more alluring than the former. Down deep in his heart he knows that he would much rather be trying to run an electric railway or a bank or building bridges or losing money in Wall street than to be doing any of those things. But the young Englishman is entirely different. He has always known and enjoyed outdoor sports. It is the life he likes best, and he imagines that ranch life is, first and foremost, a sporting life.—Abbe Carter Goodloe in Scribner's.

John D. Rockefeller is said to have lost $3,000,000 in the purchase and development of the Monte Cristo gold mines in Snohomish county, Wash. His managers admit the mines are worthless.

While the Government and many private individuals are engaged in the work of sending relief to our afflicted citizens on the Klondike, it might be well to extend the field of their charitable operations so as to include those stranded patriots who went over to help Greece out of her difficulty and have not yet been able to scrape up enough money to get back home.—Post.

It is beginning to be whispered in select circles that serious trouble has risen between Count and Countess de Castellane over the Count's insensate extravagance. A dispatch a week ago conveyed the first information to America that even the vast fortune of Jay Gould's daughter was proving unequal to the demands made upon it by the financial follies of Count Boni.

All the members of President McKinleys cabinet attended the funeral of Mrs. McKinley, his mother, except Secretary Gage, who could not leave Washington. The funeral took place from the First Methodist church in Canton, of which the deceased had been a member for many years. The flags at Washington were at half mast in honor of the Presidents severe affliction. Such a large funeral has never occurred before in Canton.

The secretary of the Randsburg Gold Mining, Milling and Water Supply Company is missing. He left for parts unknown and half a hundred brokers who hold Val Verde stock are doing their best to ascertain where he has gone. J. S. Wilde, the secretary, before he left, sold about 250,000 shares of Val Verde stock, and it is suspected that he made an over-issue.

A Tenessee editor, after carefully surveying existing conditions in the South, concludes that there is marked room for improvement in many particulars. "We let our timber rot," he says, "and buy fencing. We throw away our ashes and grease and buy soap; we raise dogs and buy hogs; we raise weeds and buy vegetables; we catch 5-cent fish with $4 rods; we build school houses and send our children off to be educated, and lastly we send our boys out with a $40 gun and a $10 dog to hunt ten-cent birds."

Near Woodly, across the line in Kern county, is a mine now down eighty-five feet. A ledge eighteen inches wide has been uncovered. They say the ore goes from $200 to $550 a ton. Parker & Frazier own it, and have taken out almost a hundred tons, and it is said that the gold in many instances is sprinkled thickly through the white quartz. Don Maltby and another man lately found a small ledge near Jack Maltby's place, that gives fair promise. They ground up about 25 pounds of ore in a hand mortar and got $60 out of it.—Visalia Times.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.
WASHINGTON, D. C.

December 14, 1897.

IRV. H. MULHOLLAND, Independence, Cal.

MY DEAR SIR:—Enclosed please find copy of a bill which I have introduced touching the question of the establishment of a free public highway into the Yosemite National Park. After visiting the various points of the Park during the summer, consulting with various persons of the State, observing the comments of the press, taking the advises of the State Bureau of Highways and of the Yosemite Valley Commissfoners, I have come to the conclusion that the only fair solution of this question is embodied in the Bill. The Commission will gather all the facts relating to the matter, and when these are gathered in detail and laid before the public and Congressi as is provided by this bill, by a competent commission, I do not apprehend that there will be any serious difficulty in determining what will be the best route and solution of this problem. I have made a member of the State Bureau of Highway Commissioners of California member of this Board by reason of the fact that it is necessary to consult the State authorities in that they may have to build a road or roads connecting with the Federal Government's work. If you have any suggestions to made in the matter I should be very pleased to receive them, and any endorsement of this eminently fair plan which you may offer will certainly go a long way in securing its passage through Congress. Will you kindly give me an early answer to this letter.

Very Sincerely yours,
MARION DE VRIES.

P. S. I shall at all times and places advocate the opening of the Tioga road, and this bill, as you see, also takes the initial step in that matter.

In the House of Representatives, December 14, 1897, Mr. DeVries introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed:

A Bill to examine, determine and report the facts necessary to the establishment of free public highways into the Yosemite National Park and appropriating moneys therefor.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized, and within ten days after the passage of this Act required, to select and appoint three commissioners, two of whom shall be members of the Engineer Corps of the Regular Army of the United States, who shall act herein without additional compensation, and one of whom shall be a duly licensed and practicing engineer, and a member of the California State bureau of highways, the last to be compensated by a per diem of not more than ten dollars per day and the powers and duties of which said commission shall be, as early as practicable and prior to the first Monday in December, anno Domini eighteen hundred and ninety eight, to do and report as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall proceed to examine, determine, and report to Congress the lengths, geographical, actual; widths; elevations, comparative and actual; grades, average, highest and lowest; ownership; cost of construction and the items constituting such; present actual value; rates of toll charged thereupon; annual and aggregate tolls collected thereby; annual and aggregate cost of maintenance thereof and the items constituting such; the courses and directions thereof; the conditions thereof and the length of season each is open to travel and actually travelled by the public, or closed by reason of snow or otherwise, of each of what are known as the Big Oak Flat toll road, the Coulterville toll road, the Wawona toll road and the Tioga road, all being roads in and about the Yosemite National Park of California.

SEC. 3. That it shall examine, survey, and report to Congress the lengths, geographical and actual; widths; elevations, comparative and actual; grades, highest and lowest; ownership of the routes, probable cost of construction and items constituting the same; the courses and directions thereof; the length of the seasons each may be inaccessible to the public for travel, by reason of snow or otherwise; a proposed wagon road leading from a point in said valley down the Merced River to a point in Merced or Stanislaus county, and of another proposed wagon road from a point in said valley to a point in Mariposa county, all in said State, and of a proposed wagon road connecting the eastern terminus of said Tioga road at Tioga or thereabouts with a point at present accessible to travel by wagon road in Mono county in said State, and of a wagon road from Hetch Hetchy Valley in the Yosemite National Park to the most accessible point on the highway leading into said valley, and of any other possible practicable wagon road into said Yosemite Valley.

SEC. 4. That said commission shall have prepared a map showing said Yosemite Valley, the Yosemite National Park, and the surrounding country, and trace thereupon the various roads mentioned and proposed in accurate detail all of the above-mentioned facts relating thereto, and any all other facts pertinent to the acquisition of the best attainable free public highway or highways into the Yosemite Valley, California.

SEC. 5. That said commission is hereby authorized and empowered to employ all necessary labor and do all acts and things necessary to a complete, effectual and speedy accomplishment of the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes of this Act.

The Beef Cattle Shortage.

Tom Keogh, a well known Nevada cattleman, said recently to a Denver reporter: "I have been in the cattle business since 1870, and this is the first time I have come out with plenty of money in my pocket and have been unable to find cattle to buy. It is the first real shortage that has ever existed in my experience. The advance in the '80s was not due to shortage, but to the speculative demand by so many people going into the range business. Rich men were buying herds for their sons, and when they commencen to sell prices went down. For several years now cattlemen have been shipping everything to market that would bring a dollar. They spayed their heifers and fattened them, they even fattened the calves and two year-olds. It used to be that only the three an four year old cattle were fed for market, and we used to see cattle weighing from 1200 to 1600 pounds. This year I am told that the falling off in the weight of cattle marketed will be over sixty pounds on the average. Next year the falling off will be over 100 pounds on the average, and that means a great deal of beef. The great bulk of beef cattle in this country are now concentrated in Nebraska, Kansas and Iowa and Missouri, where they can get corn. They will go to market next year and there will be no shortage then, for the average farmer thinks as long as he can see so many cattle around him that the world must be full of them, but after next year what? I do not know of a single large herd of cattle that can be bought. If the farmers want feeders next spring they will have to pay big prices for them, and this may hold the beef market steady but after they have cleaned out the cattle now on feed they will begin to see what a shortage really means. I have been expecting it and have been buying everthing I could find for the year past."

Users of Paper.

England uses more of the 7,900,000,000 quires of paper produced annually by the 4,000 mills of the world than any other country, the United States coming next, followed in the order named by Germany, France, Austria, Italy, Mexico, Russia and Spain. Of the above amount 600,000,000 quires are used for newspapers, of which the United States is the largest consumer.

THE BEST HAND.

It Was Held by an Outsider, and It Beat an "Ace Full."

"Say," said the drug clerk to his friend at the soda water fountain, "I ran against a play last night that made me think that I was the unluckiest man that ever drew a card."

"What was it?" asked the man at the fountain.

"Why, I had an ace full beat by another full. I'll tell you how it happened. You know we have a quiet little game over here on Dearborn street nearly every Saturday night. Well, last night we got into a five handed game. There were Julius, a chattel mortgage man, in whose office we were playing; a real estate man, a clerk for a bicycle firm, a lawyer and myself. Well, it was a small game—2 cent ante and a 50 cent limit. Along about 12 o'clock I opened the pot on a pair of aces. The lawyer raised me half a dollar, and Julius stood the raise. Of course I had to stand it too. I was the first to draw cards. I drew three cards. I thought I was pretty lucky when I picked up an ace and a pair of tens, making me an ace full. The lawyer, who had raised me on three queens, drew down to his hand and caught a pair of sevens, which made him a queen full. Julius asked for one card and made a spade flush.

"Well, I bet a check on the go, the lawyer raised me another half dollar, Julius called the raise and I raised back. We raised each other till we got about $7 in the pot. Just then the janitor of the building appeared on the scene. He had been out attending a wedding and happened in at this rather unseasonable hour. He was pretty well loaded with some kind of Scandinavian wine. He was good and ugly. It was a great surprise to him to see a game of cards going on in the building over which he had control, and he knew that if the facts ever came to the ears of the owner of the building there would be a janitor looking for a job.

"Now, what do you suppose that fellow did? Why, he just walked over to that table, kicked it over and sent the cards and chips flying in all directions. Then he told us to get out, and to do it quickly; that he would call the police and have us pinched.

"We got out and hunted up a small room in a hotel to continue the game. When we got settled down again, I made a kick for the pot on the last hand. I told the boys that I had an ace full and that there wasn't another full could beat it. But old Julius spoke up and said: "Oh, yes, there was. Vat do you t'ink of a janitor full?"—Chicago Tribune.

A Surveying Camera.

A surveying camera, styled the Bridges-Lee instrument, is being introduced in England. It resembles an ordinary camera, having a brass bound box with rapid rectilinear lens and double backs, and the usual ground glass screen. The camera body turns on a horizontal plate having a graduated rim, over which slides a vernier attached to the camera for reading horizontal angles. A clamping screw fixes the camera body to the bottom plate, which plate is mounted on a tripod head provided with leveling screws. On top of the camera box is fixed a rotating level and telescope mounted on a horizontal arm and fitted with a rack adjustment and scale, permitting vertical angles to be taken. This telescope has a vertical wire, which bisects the picture on the ground glass screen, and is coplanary with a second vertical wire inside the camera. This wire casts a shadow, which is clearly discernible on the sensitive plate or film when developed, and thus marks the center line of the picture. Behind this wire is a compass, mounted on a rack inside the camera, by means of which, when a photograph is to be taken, it can be moved back until it just fails to touch the plate. The graduation of the compass card is carried out on a vertical strip of translucent material, through which the light passes to the plate, thus photographing thereon the compass bearing. A horizontal fiber is also placed inside the body of the camera, similar to the vertical one, which, when the instrument has been properly leveled, indicates the true horizon.—Engineering News.

A Story of the Petersburg Mine.

General Horace Porter tells the following anecdote of the explosion of the Petersburg mine in his "Campaigning With Grant," in The Century: A surgeon told us a story, one of the many echoes of the mine affair, about a prisoner who had been dug out of the crater and carried to one of our field hospitals. Although his eyes were bunged and his face covered with bruises, he was in an astonishingly amiable frame of mind and looked like a pugilistic hero of the prize ring coming up smiling in the twenty-seventh round. He said: "I'll jest bet you that after this I'll be the most unpopular man in my regiment. You see, I appeared to get started a little earlier than the other boys that had taken passage with me aboard that volcano, and as I was comin down I met the rest of 'em a-goin up, and they looked as if they had kind o' soured on me and yelled after me, 'Straggler!'"

Only the Young Dance.

The maidens who are elbowed out of all pleasure at dances by young matrons will approve of the custom which obtains at the court of Berlin, where the emperor and empress set the fashion of only looking on. Elderly ladies do not dance at all and young married ladies very rarely. The floor is only meant for young people of both sexes.

An expert tells of an instance where 4,000 pearl shells were taken which yielded less than $50 worth of pearls, while in the same locality over 30 pearls were found in one day, one of which was sold for $10,000. A Queensland company, on a small area, got $6,000 worth of pearls from eight tons of shell.

As Good as He Gave.

The Viscountess Sherbrooke, wife of Robert Lowe, was in the habit of saying whatever came into her mind at the moment. The French embassador one day said to her somewhat patronizingly: "You know, England is said to be a land of shopkeepers. I had no idea of finding there such great military displays." "Ah," she replied, "the people of different countries do not understand each other. Now, I have actually been under the impression that the French were a great military nation."

According to a Stockton paper the cost of printing the advertisement for bids in the San Pedro harbor matter is just six dollars to the paper at legal rates. Millionaire Alger generously agreed to pay the cost of advertising himself, but fortunately for his purse, it was discovered that there was unexpended in the treasury $17,000 which is available for the purpose. So the secretary's six dollars is saved.

The law regarding the employment o watchmen on idle claims and their value as a means of protecting the same from being relocated, has been clearly defined by the Supreme Court in the following language, which is just now very pertinent reading to many mine owners.

"Where a mine is idle, the services of a watchman in looking after the property and taking care of the same, may constitute work upon the claim sufficient to hold it, if such care was necessary to preserve tunnels, buildings or any structures erected to work the mine. But if there was only the naked claim to be looked after, and a watchman was placed there merely to warn prospectors, and thus prevent a relocation, it would not be labor on the mine in the sense of the statute."

After hearing some friends continually praising Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, Curtis Fleck of Anaheim, California, purchased a bottle of it for his own use and is now as enthusiastic over its wonderful work as anyone can be. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

Silver Wedding.

On December 18, at their residence at Camp Independence, Mr. and Mrs. F. Schabbell celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding day. Over fifty guests were assembled to honor the occasion. The Matlack orchestra furnished the music, and one of the good old times, such as the Schabbell family always give their visitors was the result. The house was beautifully decorated with evergreens and holly and chinese lanterns were hung through the grounds. A feast fit for a king was spread, a big sample of which the printing office got, and games, dancing and congratulations were in order. Our congratulations are extended to the couple, and we trust they may live to celebrate their golden and diamond wedding. Following is a partial list of the gifts received:

Matlack Orchestra, silver berry spoon and individual salt and pepper shaker,

Mrs. Fredericka Rhine, silver cake stand.

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Gunn, silver meat fork.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Irwin, silver berry spoon.

Randsburg Notes

Speaking of the development of the Little Butte property, the Randsburg Miner says:

"With the proper development of the mine in view a shaft was sunk by the primitive method of hoisting with a windlass until the arrival of the whim, which was one of the first pieces of machinery ordered by the company. With this whim a depth of 406 feet was soon reached and the fact demonstrated that the mine was a good one. Drifts were run at regular intervals and all the workings show ore of a very high grade as well as the inevitable by-product of low grade ore which lies in contact. At the bottom of the shaft and clear to the end of the forty-foot drift at that level, there is a good strong vein with a rich pay streak of an average width of eighteen inches, which assays upwards of $700 per ton.

"Having thus demonstrated the value of the property and reached the working limit of the whim, a twenty-five horse-power gasoline engine and hoist were ordered and have recently been placed at this shaft, which is known as No 1. The hoist is of the most modern make and is provided with a self-dumping skip with a capacity of thirteen and one-half cubic feet. The shafts and drifts are equipped with good solid tracks of twelve-pound steel tee rails, and everything is on a basis of permanency and safety. Mining operations at this shaft have been suspended for a short time while placing the engine and hoist in position, but all is now ready for work again, and it will be but a few days before the work of sinking and establishing new levels below will resumed."

On the Pinmore about twenty men are working, the ore production amounting to about a ton a day to the man. The total development to date on this property amounts to 750 feet of tunnels and drifts.

A new ledge of good rock running from $60 to $75 per ton was uncovered on the Tip Top mine last Tuesday.

Obituary.

To the family of D. J. Hession the Christmas tide has brought a great sorrow. On Tuesday last their eldest child, John, was taken away by death, resulting from typhoid fever, and through the whole community the holiday cheer seems changed to great sadness. The boy was known by young and old in this county, and was of a happy, loving temperment that won him a host of friends among young and old. The trustees closed the school at Mr. Janvier's suggestion, and of the school children followed their mate to his burial. Six of the boys, Ivan Bunnevf Paul Mairs, Arthur Mairs, Charlie Mulholland, Jesse Lawrence and Joe Levy acted as pall bearers, and at the grave every child dropped a sprig of evergreen in the grave. The relatives of the family had been called from Big Pine before his death, but John never became conscious. Everything that loving hands could do was done for him, but Death claimed him as his own, and the stricken ones can only stand with heads bowed down and repeat the words that seem so bitter in the hour of sorrow—"Whatever is, is best."

A Weather Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C., Dec. 16, 1897

Irv H Mulholland, Esq., Independence, Cal

DEAR SIR:—I beg to inform you that I hope to have established within the year a station of the weather bureau at Independence, Inyo county, Cal.

Very respectfully yours,
MARION DE VRIES.

Christmas Tree Postponed.

The Christmas Tree entertainment has been postponed until New Year's eve, because of the fact of their being several cases of sickness in town among the children. It will be held in the pavilion on Friday evening next, and while the little folks must be temporarily dissapointed the will be repaid with interest on that occasion.

The Nevada Grand Jury with jurisdiction in the Uber lynching case has a chance to do the State a service by making it clear that the law does not wink at execution by private vengeance. This lynching was even more barbarous than such things usually are. The mob that took Uber out of jail, dragged him naked over frozen earth and shamed Piutes by hanging him before he had a chance to say his prayers, and then shooting out his eyes. The whole affair was unworthy of the lowest class of white men, and would have been hardly predicable of the natives of Dahomey or the Soudan. Few decent men will care to immigrate to Nevada and undertake to rear a family there if the spirit of this savage mob is tolerated by the authorities; and on that account, to say nothing of moral ones, the Grand Jury should do its utmost to bring the mob to justice. Nevada could give no better proof of civilization and respect to law and order than to run these murderers to earth as Mexico did the lynchers of Arroya, and punish them to the limit of the code. On the other hand, if it turns aside from the duty it will not soon outlive its ill-name.

Church Notice.

The order of religious services will be as follows until further notice:

All are cordially invited to be present at these services.

California's Minerals.

While gold is the mineral product of overshadowing importance in California, the State has a phenomenal variety of mineral resources as yet scarcely developed. The present year has given a large increase in the output of some of them. Lack of a present market, and especially lack of transportation facilities, keep dormant many rich resources which will eventually add millions to the mineral output.

California is the first State in the Union in the production of asphalt and bitumen, and will in time be at least second in the production of petroleum.

California produces all the quicksilver mined in the United States, and furnishes about one-third of the world's supply.

Its copper development has only just begun.

It has fine and untouched deposits of asbestos.

It has produced diamonds of considerable commercial value, and many experts believe that diamond mining will come profitable.

As a building stone for interior finishing its travertine is unsurpassed by the Egyptian product, and is unequaled in the United States.

Its beautiful onyx is already familiar.

Transportation facilities, population and the activities of a new era of progress will soon dwarf the present exhibits of its miscellaneous mineral products.

How to Prevent Pneumonia

At this time of the year a cold is very easily contracted, and if left to run its course without the aid of some reliable cough medicine is liable to result in that dread disease pneumonia. We know of no better remedy to cure a cough or cold than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. We have used it quite extensively and it has always given entire satisfaction.—Olagah, Ind. Ter. Chief.

This is the only remedy that is known to be a certain preventive of pneumonia. Among the many thousands who have used it for colds and la grippe we have never yet learned of osingle case having resulted in pneumonia. Persons who have weak lungs or have reason to fear an attack of pneumonia should keep the remedy at hand. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

REST AND RELIEF.

A piece of machinery run by steam and overworked will become cranky, creaky and out of gear, owing to some expansion of metal from heat and friction. Stop its work, rub and brighten and let it rest. In a short while it will be restored and will run smoothly. The human system is a machine. Too much work and worry are thrown upon it, too much of the heat of daily cares; too much of the steam of daily business. The nerves become cranky; they are restless, sleepless and twitchy, and a neuralgic condition sets in. Pain throws the machine out of gear and it needs rest and treatment to strengthen and restore. St. Jacobs Oil is the one remedy of all peculiarly adapted to a prompt and sure cure. So many have so freely testified from experience and use to its efficacy in the cure of neuralgia that it passes without saying that it surely cures. It will be a gracious surprise to many after the free use of it to find how easily pain, cares and worry may be lifted, and how smoothly the human machine goes on.

Pa's Prayers.

Once upon a time sickness came to the family of the poorly paid pastor of a country church, says the Omaha World-Herald. It was winter, and the pastor was in financial straits. A number of his flock decided to meet at his house and offer prayers for the speedy recovery of the sick ones and for material blessings upon the pastor's family. While one of the deacons was offering a fervent prayer for blessings upon the pastor's household there was a loud knock at the door. When the door was opened, a stout farmer boy was seen, wrapped up comfortably.

"What do you want, boy?" asked one of the elders.

"I've brought pa's prayers," replied the boy.

"Brought pa's prayers? What do you mean?"

"Yep, brought his prayers, an they're out in the wagon. Just help me, an we'll get 'em in."

Investigation disclosed the fact that "pa's prayers" consisted of potatoes, flour, bacon, cornmeal, turnips, apples, warm clothing and a lot of jellies for the sick ones. The prayer meeting adjourned in short order.

Not the poison that the covert assassin administers in the drink, the food, or some other guise, but the poison of malaria shortens the lives of myriads. There is a safe and certain antidote. COAL AND IRON.

The Important Relationship of These Two Valuable Minerals.

Statistics show that, whereas Great Britain in 1840 produced 75 per cent of the world's supply of coal, at the present time it produces only 34 per cent. Atlantic liners no longer carry coal from Great Britain for the return journey. They now take in American coal, and no less than 1,500,000 tons of American coal were thus consumed in 1895. The condition of the iron manufacturing industries has always exercised a most important influence on the production of coal, so that a large demand for iron draws with it a large demand for mineral fuel. During the last 25 years the world's production of pig iron has increased from 12,000,000 to 26,000,000 tons, but the share taken by Great Britain has fallen from 48.8 per cent to 29 per cent, while that of the United States has increased from 14.1 per cent to 26.2 per cent, that of Germany from 11.4 per cent to 21.4 per cent, and that of Russia from 3 per cent to 4.7 per cent. Indeed, iron is now being imported from the United States into this country, and, incredible as it may seem, the railway station at Middlesbrough, the center of the iron trade, is built of iron brought from Belgium. Surely, then, the author of "Our Coal Resources at the Close of the Nineteenth Century" is hardly right in thinking that British coal and iron still hold their own. He argues that other countries of Europe are exhausting their coal supplies just as Great Britain is, yet the figures he gives show that Germany has in reserve, within a depth of 3,000 feet, 109,000,000,000 tons of coal as compared with our (England's) 81,683,000,000 tons within a depth of 4,000 feet. And this estimate does not include brown coal, of which Germany raises 25,000,000 tons annually.—Nature.

CHEMICAL FIRE ENGINES

They Have Done Much to Reduce the Loss From Water at Fires.

Mr. Charles T. Hill writes of "The Fire Patrol" in St. Nicholas, the final paper in his series on the New York fire department. Mr. Hill says:

The "chemical engine," used considerably in the fire departments of several cities, has aided materially in lowering the loss by water at small fires. The preparation carried in the tanks of these engines has a double advantage—not only does it extinguish a large body of fire with the use of a small amount of water, but the liquid itself evaporates quickly, leaving very little "drip" in the apartments or floors underneath the fire.

The tanks of these engines are charged with a solution of bicarbonate of soda (baking soda) and water, with a small cylinder of sulphuric acid suspended at the top. When the tank is inverted, this acid is emptied into the soda and water, and the mixture at once generates carbonic acid gas at a great pressure. Charging the liquid with this gas gives it the necessary pressure to drive it a considerable distance. The hose is coiled around a reel on top of the engine, and always connected with the tanks, so when the firemen arrive at a fire all they have to do is to run off as much hose as they need, dash up stairs with the line, give the order to "dump" one of the tanks (there are two, carrying 60 gallons each), and they are all ready to go to work. The chemical engine has extinguished more than 25 fires of considerable size since it has been in service in the New York department, a little over a year. It is stationed on the upper west side of the city, where there are a great number of dwellings and flats, and it has aided materially in keeping down the fire losses in that part of New York.

Toymaking.

A great many toys are now made in this country, including many mechanical devices. Many toys are still imported. Such things as woolly sheep and dogs, now as highly prized by children as ever, come from Germany, as do the skin covered horses. They could be made here, but they can be produced cheaper abroad.

As a rule, whatever can be made by machinery is made here, while toys made by hand are mostly imported. The minute a thing is brought within the reach of machinery American manufacturers can pay their higher prices for labor and still beat the world. With the low prices of labor in foreign countries handmade productions can be made cheaper in them. As a result of this there are toys of some kinds which in their completed state are partly American and partly foreign. Among these are toy vehicles with horses attached. The vehicles and everything in and about them may be the product of American machinery, while the horse standing between the shafts may be from Germany.—New York Sun.

THE PILGRIMS.

"Whither, pilgrims, whither bound,
Passing slowly with no sound?"
One by one they journey by,
Gliding, gliding silently.
Slowly, slowly, dim and gray,
Hold they on their ghostly way.

"Hither, children, making May
Of the solemn autumn day,
Who were they but now went by
While the dead weeds gave a sigh?
Who the pilgrims, dim and gray,
Stopped and looked upon your play?"

"We have wandered many hours
Here where some one hides the flowers;
We heard laughter in the grass,
But we saw no pilgrim pass."
Whispers one—pale cheeked is she:
"Shapes went by. They beckoned me."

HEROES OF BUENA VISTA.

Their Sadly Neglected Burial Ground Near Saltillo, Mexico.

The hardy young Americans who left their comfortable homes in the United States more than half a century ago and came to Mexico with General Taylor to fight against the people of this country probably did not think that should they fall in battle their bones would be left to crumble to dust in an unmarked spot in this distant land. But today the dead heroes of the Buena Vista battlefield lie under but a few feet of earth in a neglected place just outside this city. At the time of their hasty burial their devoted comrades evidently sought to make the spot somewhat sacred by constructing an adobe wall around it. This wall is fast succumbing to the ravages of time, and in places it is completely gone. I visited the burial ground of the dead heroes today. A tram car took me as far as the pretty San Francisco plaza, and from there I walked through a dirty, narrow street until I came to an arroyo, on the other side of which the faint marks indicating the cemetery may be seen. Had I not received careful directions I should have passed the place unnoticed. On the side toward the city the wall is entirely gone for the most part, and a much traveled wagon road passes through the place and over the sacred dead. The place which had once been inclosed by the adobe wall embraces probably two acres, but investigation shows that many were buried west of the wall and up close to the arroyo.

Some time ago the report was published in the press of the United States that the bones of the buried soldiers were protruding from the ground, and that the place presented a sickening spectacle. This report was not strictly true, but it is undoubtedly a fact that parts of many of the skeletons have come to the surface. The ground is strewn with fragments of bones, and it is evident that they come from the men who were buried there. None of these bones is large, as the heavy traffic through the place has broken them up into small pieces. If any skulls came to the surface, they were no doubt quickly taken by the Mexican children who were about and made innocent playthings of. Had they ever appeared they certainly would not have remained intact on the surface long. In the arroyo, through which floods of water pass at times and wash one side of the burial ground, there are also many pieces of bones among the rocks, and among them I saw an unbroken rib bone which looked like that of a human.

There is not a spear of grass nor a sign of vegetable life within the inclosure. It is perfectly barren. The place should certainly receive attention at the hands of the United States congress, even if nothing more is done than to take such steps as will stay the ravages of time and weather on the treacherous soil and permit the bodies lying there to rest undisturbed. It could easily be made an attractive and even beautiful place by laying it out in walks and planting trees and plants. The ravages of the floods in the arroyo on the soil of the cemetery could be checked by the building of a substantial wall along that side. In addition to the several hundred who were killed in battle, all of the soldiers who died in the hospital here were also buried there.—Mexican Letter in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Wilmer McLean's Two Historic Houses.

General Horace Porter describes the surrender of Lee in his "Campaigning With Grant" in The Century. The surrender took place in the house of Wilmer McLean, it will be remembered. General Porter says: It is a singular historical coincidence that McLean's former home was upon a Virginia farm near the battleground of the first Bull Run, and his house was used for a time as the headquarters of General Beauregard. When it was found that this fight was so popular that it was given an encore and a second battle of Bull Run was fought, the next year on the same ground, Mr. McLean became convinced that the place was altogether lacking in repose, and, to avoid the active theater of war, he removed to the quiet village of Appomattox, only to find himself again surrounded by contending armies. Thus the first and last scenes of the war drama in Virginia were enacted upon his property.

The Key of Sheridan's Success.

General Horace Porter, in his "Campaigning With Grant," in The Century, says, after describing the battle of Five Forks:

Sheridan had that day fought one of the most interesting tactical battles of the war, admirable in conception, brilliant in execution, strikingly dramatic in its incidents and productive of extremely important results.

I said to him, "It seems to me that you have exposed yourself today in a manner hardly justifiable on the part of a commander of such an important movement." His reply gave what seems to be the true key to his uniform success on the field, "I have never in my life taken a command into battle and had the slightest desire to come out alive unless I won."

Facing the Music.

The spirit of this simile is used by John Bunyan in the meditation "Of the Horse and Drum," in his "Book For Boys and Girls; or, Country Rhymes For Children," published in 1686. Of the genuine Christian he says, inter alia:

Let drummers beat the charge or what they will,
They 'll nose them, face them, keep their places still.

TELLS A LONG STORY.

A Granite Monument at Antietam Recalls a Family History.

Major Kingsbury had a daughter as well as the son who fell at Antietam. The daughter married Simon Bolivar Buckner of Kentucky some time before the war. When General Buckner decided to go with the Confederacy, the danger of confiscation of his wife's interest in the Chicago estate confronted him. A family council resulted in the transfer of Mrs. Buckner's property to her brother. Colonel Kingsbury fell in battle without leaving a will to protect his sister's inheritance. When the war closed, the return of Mrs. Buckner's interest in her father's estate was asked for in behalf of her children. Mrs. Kingsbury declined to concede it. She claimed all that had been left in her husband's name for her son and herself. Litigation followed and dragged along for years. Major Kingsbury's 40 acres were in the heart of Chicago when the fire occurred.

In the years immediately following the war Washington had few women more talked about than the beautiful widows, Mrs. Becky Jones and Mrs. Kingsbury, the nieces of an ex-president of the United States. Mrs. Kingsbury became the wife of Gallatin Lawrence, son of one of the wealthiest manufacturers in Rhode Island. Gallatin Lawrence had chosen a diplomatic career. He was sent to Costa Rica as minister. When he came back, society at the capital had a great sensation over the talk of a duel between Minister Lawrence and Captain von der Hass of the Belgian legation because of the captain's attentions to the beautiful Mrs. Lawrence. The Belgian sailed for Europe. So did Mrs. Lawence. Gallatin Lawrence followed. There was a duel and then a divorce case. Von der Hass went to Egypt. Mrs. Lawrence went there too. Gallatin Lawrence returned to the States.

The son of Colonel Kingsbury was sent to Oxford. His inheritance was cut in two by a decision restoring to her heirs Mrs. Buckner's share in the 40 acres. One day young Kingsbury came home from Oxford, bringing a college friend. Between the English student and Mrs. Lawrence an attachment quickly developed. Mrs. Lawrence was twice the age of her son's chum. She married him and is, or was the last that friends in this country learned, living with him abroad. Kingsbury married a Levantine, and he, too, is in a foreign country. The fortune acquired through the Chicago investment has been much reduced. Mrs. Becky Jones, after a long career in Washington, traveled extensively and settled in Canada, where she is still living, by all accounts. This is the complicated sequel, briefly told, of the events which the granite monument above the stone bridge at Antietam commemorates.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The African Piano.

Among the musical instruments used on the Congo we notice the long and short drum. Some drums are used to beat the time of the dance. Some other drums are used as telephones for the transmission of messages to neighboring villages. The stringed instruments represent the African harp. The ivory horns are used for the convocation of popular assemblies. The double bell is used to call the attention of the people to some proclamation of the chief. The Africans everywhere are very musical, but their music does not always suit European taste.

The African dance is not always indulged in for amusement alone. Dancing enters into some of the most solemn ceremonies, as, for instance, the inauguration of a new king. Then the chief elect of the tribe dances very gravely before the assembled elders and the people.

The madimba had been called the African piano. It is made of calabashes of graded sizes, which are surmounted by boards, of graded sizes also, all being attached to a semicircular frame. Each board represents a note or half tone and emits its appointed sound when struck by one of the two rubber balls at the ends of two sticks, which are cleverly handled by the musician. While almost every native can beat the drum or play some of the minor musical instruments, the playing of the madimba is an art which only a few specialists learn. They must be paid for playing at festivities or ceremonies, and their art supports them, either partly or entirely.—Journal of American Folk Lore.

Sheridan In Battle.

General Horace Porter, in his "Campaigning With Grant" in The Century, says of Sheridan at Appomattox: No one could look at Sheridan at such a moment without a sentiment of undisguised admiration. In this campaign, as in others, he had shown himself possessed of military traits of the highest order. Bold in conception, self reliant, demonstrating by his acts that "much danger makes great hearts most resolute," fertile in resources, combining the restlessness of a Hotspur with the patience of a Fabius, it is no wonder that he should have been looked upon as the wizard of the battlefield. Generous of his life, gifted with the ingenuity of a Hannibal, the dash of a Murat, the courage of a Ney, the magnetism of his presence roused his troops to deeds of individual heroism, and his unconquerable columns rushed to victory with all the confidence of Cæsar's Tenth legion. Wherever blows fell thickest there was his crest. Despite the valor of the defense opposing ranks went down before the fierceness of his onsets, never to rise again, and he would not pause till the folds of his banner waved above the strongholds he had wrested from the foe. Brave Sheridan! I can almost see him now, his silent clay again quickened into life, once more riding Rienzi through a fire of hell, leaping opposing earthworks at a single bound, and leaving nothing of those who barred his way except the fragments scattered in his path. As long as manly courage is talked of or heroic deeds are honored the hearts of a grateful people will beat responsive to the mention of the talismanic name of Sheridan.

SOME ONE MIGHT HEAR.

I breathed my vows one evening
Unto my love so fair.
Her tresses brushed my forehead
As I leaned above her chair.
I saw her burning blushes
As I whispered in her ear.
But, oh, she would not answer!
Said she, "Some one might hear!"

I grasped her hand and pressed it
All fondly in mine own
And told her that her image
Was set on memory's throne.
I vowed I loved her truly,
That she to me was dear,
But, oh, no answer got I
Save she feared "some one might hear!"

I scouted at her caution.
My breath did fan her cheek.
I implored in fervent language
That she to me would speak.
I saw her with emotion
Wipe from her eye a tear,
Yet still she softly murmured,
"Suppose some one should hear!"

My hopes began to vanish.
My tears commenced to flow,
And to hide from her my weakness
I turned away to go,
When I heard a trembling whisper
Fall softly on my ear,
"Oh, yes, I fondly love you,
And I care not who may hear!"

—Finley Johnson in New York Ledger.

WHAT SHE WANTED.

The Huckster Was Called Up Four Flights to Hear Something.

A huckster was going along an east side street early one morning making the welkin ring with his singsong of "Po-ta-t-o-o-o-es, toma-t-o-o-es! Nice sweet cooking appools!" As he drove slowly along he lifted his eyes to the windows on either side of the street.

Suddenly there appeared a woman's head at a window in one of the top flats. The huckster pulled in his horse and raised his ear to listen to the commands he expected would be coming, but the woman had not the lung power to make her voice carry so far, and the huckster called out, "How's that?"

Again the woman called, and her voice came down faintly. The huckster didn't know whether she wanted potatoes, cantaloupes, tomatoes or corn. So he marked the fourth flat from the corner and motioned that he would drive around to the alley. The woman was there waiting for him and called out once more, but he couldn't understand her.

Gathering a handful of samples of various vegetables from his stock, he mounted four flights of back stairs and arrived at the top panting. The woman stood there awaiting his coming.

"Couldn't hear what you said, lady," said the huckster. "So I brought up some of each kind an you can pick what you want an I'll go down an get 'em."

"Want?" said the woman, who was in a towering rage. "Want? I don't want none of your old vegetables. What I want is for you to stop hollerin in front of this house, or I'll have you arrested. You're enough to wake the dead. My husband works all night, and he's just get into a little doze, and goodness knows it's hard enough to sleep daytimes without a fiend like you standing in front of the house yelling like a Comanche. Now you get out of here and don't you holler no more or I'll get the police after you!"

The huckster stood with set eyes and drooping jaw, the perspiration dropping off his chin, while this harangue was going on. When she had finished, he came out of his trance and said:

"Is that what you called me all the way up here for? Send for yer p'lice, lady! I'm goin to yell to beat the band." And he went down the stairs and out of the alley and up the street in front of the house with four extra links let out of his throat, and if any person slept on that street it was under the influence of opiates.—Kansas City Star.

ALL THE OX UTILIZED.

Every Particle Put to Use—Only Its Dying Breath Lost.

In an article on the "Wonders of the World's Waste," William George Jordan, in The Ladies' Home Journal, details how science at the present day utilizes the ox. "Not many years ago," he says, "when an ox was slaughtered 40 per cent of the animal was wasted. At the present time nothing is lost but its dying breath. As but one-third of the weight of the animal consists of products that can be eaten, the question of utilizing the waste is a serious one. The blood is used in refining sugar and in sizing paper or manufactured into doorknobs and buttons. The hide goes to the tanner, horns and hoofs are transformed into combs and buttons; thigh bones, worth $80 per ton, are cut into handles for clothesbrushes; fore leg bones sell for $30 per ton for collar buttons, parasol handles and jewelry; the water in which bones are boiled is reduced to glue; the dust from sawing the bones is food for cattle and poultry; the smallest bones are made into boneblack. Each foot yields a quarter of a pint of neatsfoot oil; the tail goes to the "soup," while the brush of hair at the end of the tail is sold to the mattress maker. The choicer parts of the fat make the basis of butterine; the intestines are used for sausage casings or bought by gold beaters. The undigested food in the stomach, which formerly cost the packers of Chicago $30,000 a year to remove and destroy, is now made into paper. These are but a few of the products of abattoirs. All scraps unfit for any other use find welcome in the glue pot, or they do missionary work for farmers by acting as fertilizers."

Swordswomen Abroad.

Some day it will be the women of foreign countries who will defend their nation's honor after the French-Italian style recently witnessed. Women of the upper classes in France and Spain are generally expert swordswomen. They are taught to fence as carefully and accurately as their brothers, and there are numerous schools in the two countries where young women are taught not only to fence, but to handle the broadsword.

THE BLUES.

When a cheerful, brave, light-hearted woman is suddenly plunged into that perfection of misery, the BLUES, it is a sad picture.

It is usually this way:—

She has been feeling "out of sorts" for some time; head has ached, and back also; has slept poorly, been quite nervous, and nearly fainted once or twice; head dizzy, and heart has beat very fast; then that bearing-down feeling. Her doctor says, "cheer up, you have dyspepsia; you'll be all right soon."

But she doesn't get "all right." She grows worse day by day, till all at once she realizes that a distressing female complaint is established.

Her doctor has made a mistake.

She has lost faith in him; hope vanishes; then comes the brooding, morbid, melancholy, everlasting BLUES.

THE JOURNEY.

I think of death as some delightful journey
That I shall take when all my tasks are done;
Though life has given me a heaping measure
Of all best gifts, and many a cup of plaesure,
Still better things await me further on.

This little earth is such a merry planet,
The distances beyond it so supreme,
I have no doubt that all the mighty spaces
Between us and the stars are filled with faces
More beautiful than any artist's dream.

I like to think that I shall yet behold them,
When from this waiting room my soul has soared.
Earth is a wayside station, where we wander,
Until from out the silent darkness yonder
Death swings his lantern, and cries, "All aboard!"

I think death's train sweeps through the solar system
And passes suns and moons that dwarf our own,
And close beside us we shall find our dearest,
The spirit friends on earth we held the nearest,
And in the shining distance God's great throne.

Whatever disappointment may befall me
In plans or pleasures in this world of doubt,
I know that life at worst can but delay me,
But no malicious fate has power to stay me
From that grand journey on the Great Death route.

BY A BRACELET.

ALL the anger had died out of his voice, the half-smoked pipe had dropped from his fingers upon the sand, and his head was bowed despondently. The girl seated on the upturned boat clasped her hands behind her neck, and swung back, watching him furtively.

"I'm sorry I spoke as I did just now, Kitty," he said, with a plaintive gesture of conciliation. "You're only jokin', ain't you? I guess I ain't half good enough for you; but you ain't goin' to throw me overboard, are you? The pictur' was grand, and no mistake; an' you looked just like yourself. It ain't the pictur'; it's—it's——"

He broke off short and glanced at the little circle of gold that spanned the girl's white wrist. With a quick movement she drew down the sleeve of her pink blouse, covering it from sight.

"You've good cause for it, Jem," she said. "Perhaps you didn't mean all you said, an' I hope you didn't, lad, for 'twas no way to speak o' your betters. Did I ever promise to marry you, or anyone else? Can't I take a present from anyone without bein' spoke to as if I'd committed murder or robbery or summat worse? Well?"

"I guess you can do what you like, Itty," he said, sadly; "an' nobody—least of all me—has no right to say a word."

"That's good. Maybe, for the futur' you'll know your place. Good night."

He watched the little figure in pink hurrying over the sands till it dwindled and disappeared among the shadows of the gabled street, and then drew out a boat to row across the bay. By and by there was a shout, and he glanced over his shoulder and apathetically backed the oars.

"Can't you look where you're going, you dolt? Do you want to run me down?"

"I guess I'll set you swimmin' if you're not civil," he said, squaring his shoulders. "Mebbe you think we've no blood in our veins because we live rough, an' don't dress fine an' ain't able to earn much money. I guess if you an me quarrel you'll be the sorriest; so stand clear! Good night!"

The young man in the tweed suit stood up, heedless of the heavy pollock tugging at his line, and started after the retreating boat.

"The impudent hound!" he blurted out. Then, as he cleverly played the fish, and drew it in, till it lay gasping under the thwart, he laughed softly. "Another of the girl's admirers, I suppose," he said.

In the morning Jem and Ted Trewlowe came down the village street together. Jem carried a coil of rope and a pointed iron bar—the stock-in-trade of his hazardous profession, that of egg hunter.

The boat was headed for the gray-white column across the bay, the Witches' Pillar. They scrambled up the rift in the cliff, and reached the breezy uplands. The iron bar was driven deep into the soil, and five minutes later the figure of a man swung high over the sea, terrifying the birds, and looming black against the lighter background of the cliff.

Little Trewlowe sat steadying the swaying rope, his heels firmly wedged in the holes he had cut to keep them from slipping, and his black cutty gripped tight between his clenched teeth. There was a frightened look in his eyes, for Jem had seemed so queer and so little like himself.

Suddenly the rope slackened, and then grew taut again with a fierce jerk that started the bar a full inch and seared his hands. Then it swayed limply against the cliff edge, and a faint cry from below sent his heart into his throat.

He peered over the brink with almost sightless eyes, and called again. The rope streaked down, slackened and limp. He fancied he saw a dim blurr of bubbles scarring the smooth surface of the distant water and his head reeled.

With trembling fingers he knotted the rope firmly to the bar, and throwing off his coat, swung himself over the brink.

The sun climbed the sky and slid down lazily behind the Witches' Pillar, decking the sky with gold and the big eye of the far-off lighthouse started dazzling through the gloom. The boats came in one by one.

Long after the light in the west had melted into a hazy gray, Kitty sat and mused in the cottage porch. When the shadows drew in the lighthouse unclosed its ponderous eye and glared at her for a moment like some huge beast as it circled round, cleaving the darkness.

"I think I'll just run down an' see Mrs. Trewlowe, dad," she said, shakily looking through the open door.

Jem's little cottage, with its screen of tall fuchsias, stood silent and deserted. The frenzied beat of her knuckles on the door echoed back to her mockingly through the two tiny rooms.

A panting woman, with a dingy shawl thrown over her head, met her half way down. Some instinct intangible and undefined, seemed to tell each what she wished, yet dreaded to learn; for no words were spoken, no questions asked. Their hands met in unspoken sympathy, and hand in hand they descended the hill.

They paused on the bluff, straining their eyes in hopes of seeing a dark speck crawl out under the shadow of the cliffs. A boat was moving outward toward the deeps where the conger lay, and the girl's heart grew bitter against its occupant, and the tiny band of gold upon her wrist seemed to scorch her flesh.

When they stood below the creaking sign of the Merry Mariners the woman hung back, and looked at her piteously.

"I'll go in," said Kitty, touching the woman on the arm.

There was a sudden hush as the white-faced girl tottered in and gave a hurried glance around.

"Is—Is he here?" she gasped. "I—I mean——"

An old hag, seated in the far corner of the room, bared her toothless gums and uttered a cracked laugh.

"No, he hain't, dearie. I seed him goin' congerfishin' in his swell clothes. P'raps, if I axed him prettily, he'd put me in a pictur', too! Eh, dearie? He! he!"

"I mean Jem—Jem Holt—my Jem," as she panted, catching her breath. "Ted Trewlowe an' him went nestin' on the Pillar this mornin'. Ted ain't back, an' my Jem ain't back, an—Jem and Ted Trewlowe—my Jem—is—is—"

She broke down, covering her face with her hands. The men laid aside their pipes and went out softly, whispering among themselves.

The sad-eyed woman was waiting for her, and together they hastened to the beach and launched old Andrew's boat. The others were far across the bay already.

The oars splashed sluggishly, and the boat sped on through the creeping dusk. At last the girl peered over her shoulder and stood up, covering her mouth with her hands.

"Hallo!"

An answering cry in a man's deep tones echoed across the water, and she bent to the oars once more. Then she drew back her arm and tossed something into the air—something that glistened with a yellowish tinkle at the artist's feet.

It was a narrow chain of gold, embellished with a heart-shaped pendant—his gift returned.

The nose of the boat veered round and they headed up the bay. The woman still rocked herself, sobbing softly, but Kitty's cheeks were dry, though her breath came and went in uncertain gasps.

A hoarse cheer swelled up through the night and set their hearts singing. Kitty's head went down on her hands, and tears came at last, as the heavy burden of agonized suspense fell from her. One by one the boys tolled across the light, and were soaked up by the darkness under the Farcombe shore. Kitty roused herself and followed.

There was a chattering crowd of men and women outside the Merry Mariners, but they fell aside to let her pass, and they thronged the doorway curiously. The room inside was packed, and little Trewlowe, very pale and shaky, was jerkingly narrating the adventure between the sips of his brandy and water. But Kitty saw no one but Jem.

He sat in the middle of the room, the ashen hue of his face, showing clearly through the grime, his hands bruised and bleeding, and his clothes torn to shreds. They had cut away the left sleeve of his coat, and the brawny village doctor was setting the splintered bone of his arm.

In a moment she was kneeling beside him, heedless of them all, with her arms clasped round his neck and her cheek pressed to his.

"O, Jem!" she whispered. "Jem! Jem!"

By and by they went down the road together in the darkness, Jem's uninjured arm circling the girl's waist, and her head resting on his shoulder.

"It was mighty lonesome up there, lassie," he said softly, "an' I was thinkin' of you mostly. Little Ted couldn't get back, an' couldn't get to me neither; so I guess I had plenty o' time to think. I'll work hard for you, darlin'; but I guess I shan't be able to buy you no—no——"

She drew down his big hand and pressed it against her slim wrist.

"Hush, Jem!" she said. "It's gone—I've given it back to him."

WHITE CAPS

Indiana is conceded to be the home of the White Cap. It is in the Hoosier State that the organization and practice had their birth, and, although both have since spread to many States, the people of no other community have been so afflicted with them as have the Indianans. How or by whom the first White Cap organization was formed is not known, but early in the 80's it began operations, and its success in ridding certain localities of miscreants led to the rapid spread of the organization in many parts of the State. These men, wearing white pillow-cases over their heads and shoulders, with holes cut through to enable them to see, began switching better living into the lawless element. Armed with switches they would ride silently up to the home of an outlaw, and, taking him unawares, would switch him nearly to death. In several cases death did result from the beatings which were administered usually to the outlaw and his whole family irrespective of sex. The White Caps were regularly organized and governed with great sternness and secrecy. No one was admitted unless his character for honesty was above reproach. A sitting was held where it was thought desirable that the organization take up some special case. When it had decided that punishment was necessary it was meted out with terrible sternness. In the earlier days the visitation seldom miscarried. The victim had no warning, until some night a score of men broke into his cabin and whipped him almost to death at his own gate post. He was then given twenty-four hours to leave the country. The death which in many instances followed refusals to obey this mandate had a salutary effect. In some instances where resistance was made the White Caps shot the victim full of bullets. Cabins were usually burned after the whipping had taken place. This went on for years. The authorities made some feeble attempts to prosecute the White Caps, but it was impossible to get the slightest evidence against them.

When it was found that they were as immune from the law as the outlaws had been they turned their attention to those guilty of minor offenses and became themselves the victims of a moral laxity. They took to regulating domestic difficulties between husbands and wives. They punished petty thieves and the victims of vice with the same barbarity they had meeted out to murderers and the larger criminals. Neighborhood quarrels, petty hates and personal dislikes were made the subject of white capping and politics began to play its part in the outrages. Scores of innocent men and women were whipped and submitted to tortures unspeakable. In still more cases the property of the victims was confiscated by their persecutors. The organization became lax and admitted members who used it to wreak their personal spite. Men in twos and threes began to do White Cap work on their own account and the parent organization found itself charged with crimes and persecutions of which it had no knowledge. White capping ceased for a time under the stern rule of the late Governor Gray, but it again raged under Governor Matthews, although he strove his best to put it down. The evil has again come to the front, and Governor Mount has ordered a thorough investigation of the terrible affair at Osgood, that the guilty men may be brought to justice. The sudden and apparently general revival of white capping in Indiana is causing much concern in official circles, and there is a pronounced sentiment in favor of drastic measures on the part of the Governor to the end that the organizations may be broken up and their leaders if not the rank and file be brought to respect the law. In certain counties of the State regular White Cap organizations are in existence. The members are known to many citizens who would gladly give evidence against them but for the fear that the local authorities would not be able to protect them against the violence which might result.

Many of the recent outrages have been characterized by exceptional brutality. Some of the victims have suffered without any cause being known to those who were in a position to judge best of their lives. In Brown County a man and a woman, the latter sick at the time, were taken out of their cabin at night, the cabin, with their little effects, burned and themselves driven from the county with threats of hanging if they returned. In another instance in the same county a man was unmercifully whipped because he would not work, though a physician was attending him at the time and testified afterward that it was impossible for his patient to perform any kind of labor. This man was receiving aid from the township trustees and the reason for attempting to drive him to work was that he might not be a burden upon the taxpayers of the township. After the whipping he refused to accept further aid on account of fear of another beating and his immediate neighbors contributed to his support till he was able to return to work. He is reported to be a quiet, inoffensive citizen and was never accused of crime. A case in Monroe County that excited great indignation among the order-loving citizens was that of the whipping of a widow on account of alleged improper conduct. Her husband had died a year before, and she was trying to cultivate a piece of poor land and make a living for herself and two small children. She was the associate of her nearest neighbors, regularly attended the country church, and no one had ever breathed a word against her character. To the surprise of all her friends she was taken from her home at night and threatened with a whipping if she did not leave the neighborhood. Only her piteous pleading saved her from the pain and indignity which the White Caps intended to inflict. It is said in behalf of the White Cap organization of the county that it was not the mover in this outrage, and that none of its members were present, but the citizens who have appealed for relief point to this fact as an additional reason for the disbanding of the organization, for it illustrated what may be done in its name.

WHITECAPS AT THEIR COWARDLY WORK.

Country Life and Living.

Referring to a fashion or tendency which is certainly worthy of commendation and encouragement, one of the metropolitan dailies suggests that perhaps nothing is more indicative in a small way of our growth as a nation in civilization than the increased liking among our wealthier young people for country living and the broader and more wholesome interests attendant on such an existence. Twenty-five years ago even fashionable people rarely, if ever, quitted the groove in which they all moved. They were content with the town life in a brownstone front in winter, the smaller and less cared-for cottage in Newport, or some other watering place in summer, or the then peculiarly American fashion of herding together in the great hotels at various famous resorts of the day. The rich young men of that generation found their pleasures in dancing and flirting, fast driving, European travels and more or less rapid living. The comparatively recent development of what seems to be an American leisure class has had undoubtedly a great deal to do with the changes in the ways of living and thinking among the fashionable younger set, but one must not underrate also the influence of outdoor sports which imported originally from England, has in the last decade taken root in the healthy Anglo-Saxon proclivities of our race, and produced a rapid and vigorous growth, the effects of which are apparent in the physical development of the younger generation.—Good Housekeeping.

A KENTUCKY WOMAN.

What She Would Do If Elected President of the United States.

Mrs. Josephine K. Henry, who, if she were elected to the Presidency of the United States, would stand for the remonetization of silver, for prohibition for universal suffrage and agnosticism is a Kentucky woman who has already been mentioned as a candidate for the Presidential nomination in 1900. Mrs Henry for many years has been prominent in Kentucky as a reformer and she is one of the leading women of that State. She is a native of Newport, Ky. Her father was Capt. Euclid Williamson, a steamboat man in the days of the floating palaces of the Ohio and Mississippi. Her father died when she was very young, but her mother looked after the child and was careful that she was given a liberal and a good education. The child evinced a genuine talent for music, and she is to-day in no mean way a capable musician. As a poet Mrs. Henry has made a good success. Her verses have the true ring and have been widely copied in the newspapers of the country. "Prisoners of Fate" is especially well known. Her husband, Capt. William Henry, was an officer in the Confederate army and served with distinction on the side of the South. Six years ago Mrs. Henry lost her only son. This event cast a gloom upon her life which she has tried to lighten by her work for womankind. She does not dream even of being elected President, but her ideas of what should be are just as vigorous as if she had some hope at some time in the future of being the nation's chief magistrate.

MRS. JOSEPHINE K. HENRY.

Hypnotizing by Telephone.

The wonders of the telephone never cease. The latest brought to the attention of the New York Electrical Engineer is the hypnotizing of a young boy through the medium of the telephone at Houston, Texas. It is needless to surmise, adds the Engineer, that the subject was a pronounced cataleptic; but the fact brought to light would seem to indicate more strongly than ever the necessity for a stringent law against the promiscuous practice of hypnotizing. The Engineer does not imagine that many persons could be influenced hypnotically over the telephone, yet it believes it will be just as well to guard against such practices by prompt and effective legislation.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Hit, but Not Killed by a Cannon Ball.

A unique distinction belongs to Sir Robert Rawlinson, K. C. B.—that of being the only soldier who has been knocked out of the saddle by a cannon ball without being killed. The identical forty-two-pound shot is preserved by Lady Rawlinson as an interesting relic. At the Crimea Sir Robert was riding with a group of artillery officers, when he announced his intention of turning back. At this moment a shot from the Russian lines came whizzing along in front of him, cutting the reins and pommel of the saddle, and wedging a steel purse with terrific force against the rider's hip-bone.

CHAT OF THE CHURCH.

WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE RELIGIOUS WORLD.

News Notes from All Lands Regarding Their Religious Thought and Movement — What the Great Denominations Are Doing.

Doing, Not Thinking.

DOING, not dreaming, is the secret of success. Thinking out plans will not amount to anything unless the thought be followed by determined will to execute. Not the faithful talker, but the faithful toiler, leaves the broad mark of work accomplished. "Not he that saith Lord, Lord, but he that doeth my Father's will." Not the son that promised, but he that went, was the one who received the reward. "This one thing I do," not "This one thing I think," made Paul. "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily." Going about continually doing good was the example left by Christ; and the promise is given, "To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."—Parish Visitor.

But I raise up in de Bible en I holdin' dar to-day!

Bible and Self-Culture.

Rev. John Henry Barrows of Chicago said in a recent sermon:

According to Apostle Paul, the gracious word of God is able to edify and to sanctify the soul. It is abundantly able to impart the highest intellectual and moral self-culture. I have no doubt that to the grand Christian Endeavor movement is due very much of the ever increasing interest in Biblical study which finds expression in so many ways. The University of Chicago is doing a great deal to develop an interest in Biblical studies, not only among preachers and scholars, but among all classes of people.

In the mountains of Lebanon, Christian homes are distinguished by the traveler from all others by their glazed windows, windows glazed in order that men and women may read their Bibles behind them in the winter storms. We should have no fears for the future of Chicago or of America if we knew that behind the glazed windows in all our homes, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the St. Lawrence to the gulf, reverent faces were gathered every evening about that word of God which giveth light.

Built from One Rock.

The following story comes from Waterloo, Iowa: The members of the Presbyterian Church decided to erect a new place of worship. Stone was scarce; in fact, there were no quarries and no rock suitable for building purposes nigh at hand. At last their attention was called to what was apparently a large bowlder, which stood in the middle of a plain about eight miles from the town. This huge mass of rock was like an island in the midst of a vast sea. About eight feet of it projected above ground. The work of excavating this gigantic bowlder was at once begun. When exposed to view it was found to be twenty-eight feet high, thirty feet long and twenty feet wide. On this monolith the workmen began their labors with drill, hammer and dynamite, and the enormous rock was converted into building stones. The pieces were conveyed to the town, and before long a wonderful metamorphosis was apparent, and then this giant bowlder, after resting undisturbed for countless years and buried by the deposits of ages, was transformed into a beautiful church. In its rough state this greater rock is estimated to have weighed more than 2,500 tons.

Empty Heads.

I verily believe that a great deal of bad company, drunkenness and folly and sin, comes from mere want of knowledge, from emptiness of head. A young man or young woman will not learn, will not read, and therefore they have nothing useful or profitable to employ their leisure hours, nothing to think of when they are not actually at work; and so they run off to vain and often wicked amusements. Gambling, what does that ruinous vice come from save from idleness of head, from having nothing to amuse your minds with save cards and dice? and so

"The devil finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do."

Therefore if you want to keep your brain and thoughts out of temptation, read and learn; get useful knowledge; and all knowledge—I say all knowledge—must be useful. I care little what you read, provided you do not read wicked books; or what you think of, provided you do not think of sin and folly. For all knowledge must be useful, because it is knowledge of God's works. Nothing lives upon earth but what God has made. Nothing happens upon earth but what God has done. So whatever you study, you may be certain you are studying God's works and God's laws; and they must always be worth the study of rational beings and children of God. Learn what you like, only learn; for you are in God's world, and as long as you learn about God's world your time cannot be thrown away.—Rev. C. Kingsley.

The Loftiest Spirit.

A young woman whose life was full of lofty ambitions found herself occupied day after day with disagreeable household tasks. As the future seemed to shut down hopelessly around these homely duties, the girl grew complaining and bitter. One day her father, who was the village doctor, said to her: "Do you see those vials? They are cheap, worthless things in themselves, but in one I put a deadly poison, in another a sweet perfume, in another a healing medicine. Nobody cares for the vials themselves, but for what they carry. So with our duties, insignificant and worthless in themselves, but the patience or anger or high thinking or bitterness which we put in them, that is the important thing, the immortal thing." A celebrated Frenchman said: "Perfection consists not in doing extraordinary things, but doing ordinary things with an extraordinary spirit."

The Hope of the Republic.

Law, learning, charity are insufficient to save our nation from vice, ignorance and infidelity. All have been tried and found wanting. But add to them the practical morality of Christianity and a pure and honorable citizenship is assured beyond all fear. It is hard to convince the people of this tremendous fact, sustained by all history ancient and modern, Jewish and Pagan. I believe in churches, colleges and houses of mercy, and support them all, but my hope is in a citizenship, born of Christian faith and practice; give us these and the republic will live forever.

We are in danger of forgetting the sad fact in history that the fate of republics is empire. Can we reverse the verdicts of history? I believe we can by the application of the principles of Christianity to American Citizenship.—John P. Newman, D. D.

African Appreciation.

A noted evangelist is fond of telling of his experiences in preaching to the negroes in the South. At the close of one of his meetings a very large old colored woman came up to him and shook his hand warmly while she said: "God bless you, Brudder Jones! You's evahbody's preacher, an' evahbody loves ter heah you preach, an' evah nigger loves to heah you; an' Brudder Jones, you preaches mo' like a niggah than any white man that evah lived; an' Brudder Jones, you've got a white skin, but t'ank de Lawd, you've got a black heart!"—Outlook.

Converts in Japan.

Bishop McKim, the Episcopal prelate of Tokio, says that of a total of 150,000 converts in Japan, the Roman Catholics are first with about 50,000, and the Greek Catholics second with 23,000. The Episcopalians number in the neighborhood of 10,000. He says that in the matter of church government, ritual and theology, the Episcopal and Greek Catholic churches in Japan are closer than any other religious bodies, and intimates that the two bodies may soon be united.

The Wrong Thing.

To do the right thing at the wrong time is as bad as to do the wrong thing at any time. How often have we blundered just at this point! If we review the past we will see that in many cases we have brought trouble upon ourselves, not because we did a wrong thing, but because we did just the right thing to be done, but we did it at the wrong time. We need great caution and care. Guard well this point.

Had Rock and Rye.

In every Kansas town there is an old toper who is denied whisky by the drug store keeper. It is usually the case that his family has warned them. The problem of his life, says the Pittsburg Dispatch, therefore, is how to circumvent the drug stores and procure his beverage, and it must be confessed that at times his methods rise to the heights of genius.

Several times recently the old toper of Smith Center has appeared at a drug store with a quart bottle to which could be seen a great wad of gum camphor. He made affidavit that his wife needed a mixture of alcohol and camphor for her aches and pains, and the druggist filled the bottle according to request.

Finally the old toper began coming so often and so regularly that the druggist became suspicious. He took the bottle behind his prescription case and fished out the gum camphor. It was rock candy.

Some Satisfaction.

Mrs. Bridewell—I'm glad I wasn't born in France. Just think of having your husband selected for you by somebody else!

Mrs. Oldham—I know; but there's the consolation of having somebody to blame it on to.—Judge.

Even if the members of the Hawaiian Cabinet are ready to "sacrifice honor" in order to bring about annexation it is passible they have not enough of that article in stock to make a very impressive spectacle.

While there is an inclination to sympathize with Phil Armour over his loss of $1,000,000 the fact may be recalled, as a ray of consolation, that somebody else must first have lost this same money or Armour would have had it.

It is to be regretted that missionaries sent to Korea should have taken to politics. Missionaries have made the same mistake before, and no good has ever come of it yet. When religion and politics are thrown together an analysis of the compound shows hardly a trace of the former.

The Garlock correspondence of the Mining and Metallurgical Journal of Los Angeles gives the following news from that part of the booming desert:

"One hundred tons of ore from Mojave are to be milled and cyanided here next week for a test; if successful a contract for 1000 tons will be let at once.

Some remarkably rich strikes have been reported from the Panamint and Slate Range country, showing beautiful specimens of free gold.

"It is feared that Johannesburg will take Garlock's Panamint trade when the railroad is finished, but with coal at $7.50 per ton and water free we can always mill the ore of this country at $3 to $4 per ton and get the work.

Mrs. George M. Pullman has decided to accept her dower interest in the estate of her husband instead of abiding by the terms of the will. According to the will she was given $50,000 in cash, the homestead in Chicago and the income from $1,250,000 during her life, the sum to revert to the estate after her death. Her acceptance of the will would have made it practically impossible for her to leave anything to the two sons, who were practically disinherited by their father. Her third interest of the dower gives her $3,900,000 in personal property, and a one-third interest for life in the real estate held by Mr. Pullman. The estimate makes the estate of Mr. Pullman aggregate at least $15,900,000.

James I. Clements of Los Angeles, the "El Dorado King of the Klondike," who is at the Lafayett Hotel, New York, on Christmas eve displayed one of the costliest, if not the costliest, Christmas trees which was ever seen the world round. It would have made Santa Claus himself stand and blink in wonder. In this richly laden tree were 750 $20 gold pieces and Klondike nuggets as presents, worth $5000, which brought the total up to $50,000. Last year the man who fixed up the Christmas tree dined on Christmas day off a piece of caribou meat with the top of a tin lard bucket for a plate and his fingers serving the purpose of knife and fork. The tree occupied space in the Hotel Lafayette, and those fortunate enough to be allowed to feast their eyes upon this prodigal display of wealth were granted permission by the proud owner to sift the $20 pieces through their fingers, to lift double handsful of gold nuggets and guess how much they were worth. Every visitor carried away a little nugget.

Senator Lodge is preparing a bill favoring the purchase of the three islands of St. Thomas, St. Croix and St. John, owned by Denmark, in the West Indies. The Senate passed a resolution a year ago asking the State Department to ascertain whether the islands were still for sale, at what price they were held, and whether any other nation was after them. Denmark has replied that she is still willing to sell, and that two European Governments are now negotiating for their purchase. These are supposed to be Great Britain and Germany.

The United States has been discussing this purchase for nearly thirty years. In 1868 negotiations went so far that a treaty was negotiated for the purchase, by which this country was to pay $8,000,000 for the islands, but it failed of ratification. On this occasion the people of the islands voted on the question and decided almost unanimously for annexation.

The Danes do not want any European power to secure possession of them. A most liberal offer would be made to the United States to purchase at a comparatively small price—almost nothing—for it has been practically decided by Denmark to either sell these islands or give them liberty. Most of the residents of the islands British immigrants, and their first move after securing independence would be to petition England for a protectorate. The present expense of maintaining a government on the islands reaches $150,000 a year. Considering her position in the European concert it is not thought necessary for Denmark to maintain a station in the West Indies, hence her willingness to sell.

St. Thomas has a harbor large enough to accommodate the navies of the whole world, and in view of the advantages to be gained, Senator Lodge is sanguine of securing an appropriation that will enable the islands to be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Stars and Stripes. The three islands have a total of 100 square miles of territory and a population of 40,000. St. Croix is the biggest with sixty square miles and 25,000 population. This island is very fertile and gives an excellent crop of tropical products, especially sugar.

Randsburg Notes.

The Randsburg and Kramer broad gauge railroad is at last completed. It was expected that it would be finished some time ago, but shipments of ties were very much delayed, thus impeding the progress of the road. The first excursion will consist of the members of the Mining Exchange and the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, who will come up to inspect the camp and outlying district.

The advantages to accrue to Randsburg and the adjoining district from the advent of this railroad cannot be overestimated. Heretofore it has taken from six to ten hours to make the stage ride from Mojave and Kramer, which will be cut down to an hour and a half, thus putting this rich mining territory into close communication with the outside world and make it a very desirable place to live.

There is not the least doubt in the world that Randsburg is a permanent mining camp. A Board of Trade has lately been organized of the foremost business men of the camp, which is actively at work preparing to give all sorts of information, and, with the citizens' committee, it has started in to improve the general appearance of the town by grading the thoroughfares. The chemical engine recently purchased by the fire department does excellent work, and danger of fire is well guarded against.

The miners' union is a very strong body here and is composed of a good class of miners who have a good influence on the general behavior of the camp. Assessment work is being pushed forward at a rapid rate in all directions, as this is the clase of the year, and rich strikes are being reported every day. The placer diggings are panning out extremely well and all of the men who are running dry washers are making good money. In the last month or two quite a number have been running right in the heart of town and paying well. Some of the school boys are running machines after school hours, also Saturdays and Sundays. This is the first year of the school, which has been a success from the start. There are about seventy on the roll, with a good average attendance.

A fire broke out early Christmas morning in the storeroom of Norton Obear, on Butte avenue, and before it was out had destroyed not only the warehouse but the residence of J. D. Brown and a restaurant owned by Mrs. Enners and Mrs. Parish. The warehouse contained several big tanks of gasoline and kerosene, and there were several explosions, but no one was injured. The fire company, with the chemical engine, succeeded in preventing a more serious fire, though the stillness of the night was a great help to the firefighters. Several other buildings were badly scorched. The loss was quite heavy and there was no insurance.

We clip the following items from the Miner:

The Little Butte has started up again after making many improvements spoken of in last week's issue, and is now running three shifts, and the big engine is running about twenty-three hours and sixty minutes a day. The balance of the time the engineer devotes to rubbing her down and grooming her. Things look decidedly lively over on Gold Hill.

The Los Angeles Mining Exchange, which has a membership of about 100 is now planning to have all its members pay a visit to our camp during the holidays, and spend several days with us. They will bring a band of music and generally make things lively during their stay in camp.

Fred L. Johnson recently took eight tons of ore out of the LaCrosse mine that produced fifty-three and one-half ounces of gold valued at more than $800. This was simply the free milling product and did not include the sulphurets that were lost in the tailings. The La Crosse is situated in the rich Stringer district, and this little milling shows what can be done there with a little hustle, as the the ore in this instance was the result of the labor of Mr. Johnson and one other man for two weeks.

The welcome sound of the quartz mill at Johanhesburg is plainly heard here in the quiet of each evening and sounds like business.

Considerable extra money was put in circulation in this vicinity last Monday, when the railroad contractors paid out to their men $3,700 in good hard cash, and took up about $1,500 worth of time checks which had been given out since the last pay day. This may be considered one of the first financial benefits the district has derived from the road.

Chances For Success In Large Cities.

In solving "Problems of Young Men" Edward W. Bok, in The Ladies' Home Journal, replying to an inquirer, contends that opportunities for promotion (in business) are more numerous in large cities than in smaller communities, but they are not better. "There are more chances in the larger cities, but likewise there are more applicants for the chances. Salaries may be higher in the centers, but so, too, is the cost of living. Things always equalize themselves. To my way of thinking, a moderate business success in a small community means more to a man in point of living and absolute satisfaction than a greater success in a larger city."

Catch Fish With Wheels.

A curious plan for catching fish is used on the Columbia river. A number of wheels are set up in the middle of the stream, which, as they turn round, catch up the fish and cast them into troughs by the river banks. The salmon are then tinned and sent all over the world. As much as five tons' weight of fish a day has thus been taken.—Kansas City Star.

Between Carthage and Stillingville, in Jefferson county, N. Y., there is a stretch of country where the sand drifts like snow, causing great losses and blinding the eyes of those who look up wind. It is a desolate, barren region, where the soil is only as deep as the roots of the grass.

REAL HORSE SENSE.

STORIES OF EQUINE INTELLIGENCE BY A COUNTRY DOCTOR.

His Experience Shows That Horses Have a Sense of Humor and Love Fun—Tricks Played In the Meadow by Old Ball, Frank and the Broken Rein.

The country doctor is expected to go whenever called—rain or shine, heat or cold, night or day; sometimes, perhaps, leisurely, but often as quickly as possible. Through all this his horse and himself are constant companions and share together the joys and the sorrows of the road. It is not strange, therefore, that an attachment of more than ordinary intensity often springs up between them, during which the man notes the almost human qualities of the horse.

While quite a boy I knew a horse of such humor and intelligence that he gave me a high opinion of horses in general. Somehow the tricks of old Ball led me to consider horses as almost of kin to human beings, and I have always talked to them and treated them accordingly. Ball, a fine animal belonging to my uncle, who lived on a farm adjoining ours, was a sorrel horse of good size and especially fine head, with heavy neck and shoulders. He had done a great deal of farm work in his time, but was now too old for anything but occasional light service, so he usually had the range of a pasture in front of the house, that reached up to the yard fence. There were cattle and sheep in the same pasture.

Ball was noted for his cunning and clever tricks, such as opening gates and doors, pulling down bars and the like, but no one suspected him of playing practical jokes on sheep when one after another was found on the wrong side of the fence. It was by his antics and evident delight whenever a sheep was so found that he attracted attention. A watch was instituted, and soon, when Ball thought no one saw him, he slyly picked up a sheep by the wool with his teeth and dropped it over the fence. Then, going away some distance, he anxiously waited, evidently watching for some one to come out of the house. As soon as he saw that the sheep was discovered he gave a snort and began to run and kick up his heels with delight.

Sometimes he would steal articles and hide them, evidently just for the fun of the thing. One day a heavy maul, such as is used for splitting rails and wood, was left so near the fence that he could reach it. When he supposed that no one saw him, he took the maul up with his teeth, carried it to the farther side of the field, carefully hid it behind the stump of a tree, and then watched the result. This time he had been seen carrying the maul away, so the men made great ado, pretending to be hunting for it, looking in the fence corners and behind stumps, while Ball was running, snorting and kicking up his heels with unbounded delight. Whenever they approached the maul, he tried to attract their attention to some other point.

While I have been engaged in the practice of medicine my horses have had no opportunity to perform tricks like these, but many times I have seen exhibitions of intelligence and humor no less marked.

I have known many horses that showed a good degree of humor as well as intelligence, but for good sense I think Frank was a little superior to any other. He was 7 years old when I traded for him.

When he first came into my possession, he had the habit of frequently throwing his head up, and, as his bridle was somewhat loose, the brow band would sometimes lodge upon his ear. Whenever this happened I would stop him, get out of the buggy and replace it. He soon learned to throw the band up whenever he would like to stop and be petted a little. I might have prevented this at once by making the bridle fit better, but it occurred to me that, with this beginning, I might soon teach him to stop when anything else got wrong, and this I did, so that the least disarrangement of the harness would cause him to stop and wait to have it fixed. Sometimes, however, he would stop when the trouble was not, in my opinion, sufficient to warrant so cautious a procedure.

One day, as I was driving along at a slow trot over a smooth, lonesome road I had dropped the reins over the buggy apron and was becoming quite interested in the reading of a newspaper when Frank suddenly stopped. I looked all around and over him, but could see nothing wrong, so I said, with some emphasis, "Get up, Frank!" But he still stood and kept throwing his head up and down. As I sat there with the paper in my hand I looked again, and especially to the bridle, but saw nothing wrong. I now, without taking up the reins, took the whip from its socket and, giving him a sharp out, repeated my command to go along. This undeserved punishment nettled him very much, but still he would not move forward. After standing for a few moments, as if in deep thought, he suddenly turned to the right until the wheel on that side touched the buggy. Then again he stood stock still, only throwing his head as before. I now took up the reins and pulled with the left hand to bring him back into the road, when, to my astonishment, I found that the rein on that side, which had been fastened with a snap, was unsnapped.

When I got out to fasten it, Frank squealed. I believe a horse never squeals unless he is excited. I never heard Frank squeal before, but now he not only squealed, but shook his head, pawed the ground and manifested his delight by every means that he could command. As we afterward moved along homeward several times, as the thought would come to his mind afresh, he would shake his head and squeal for joy.—Youth's Companion.

By Canoe From Coast to Coast.

Mr. F. C. Nicholas recently described the goldfields of western Colombia for the geological section of the New York Academy of Sciences, and incidentally pointed out a route by which, in the wet season, a man might go in a canoe from the Atlantic to the Pacific across the northwestern corner of South America. The proposed route follows the river Atrato to the divide, which lies in a series of swamps, and then, by way of one or two smaller streams, reaches the river San Juan, which empties into the Pacific.

Tomorrow is the day we "swear off."

J. C. Crocker has gone to Bakersfield with a band of mules.

Tom Hill of Big Pine spent a couple of days in town this week.

There will be a dance this evening following the Chtistmas tree.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. McKenzie of Lone Pine were in town yesterday.

Mrs. E. L. Judd of Bishop is visiting with friends at Independence.

R. S. Miner, Esq., arrived at Independence last Friday evening and will spend about a month here.

Julian Eibeshutz started for San Francisco yesterday, where he will spend a vacation of a couple of weeks.

Ed. Clarke arrived at Independence yesterday on his way home from Los Angeles. He went on to Bishop today.

The Reward mine and mill are again running full blast, the recent cold snap having caused a temporary suspension.

Miss Lena Harris came down from Big Pine last Friday and is visiting with the family of L. Wood. She expects to return to San Francisco after the holidays.

Wm. Rowan of Bishop passed through town last Tuesday on his way to Los Angeles with a band of horses. Mr. Rowan understands the market conditions in the southern country probably better than any dealer in the valley, and as he had a fine looking lot of animals he should do very well.

The Board of Education met yesterday, all the members being present, and adjourned today. Certificates were renewed as follows: Misses Evelyn Gnter and Libbie Garretson and George F. Willis. Misses Margaret Isball and Idella Gregory were granted certificates on credentials. Some changes were made in the course of study and a list of examination questions prepared.

A Gross Wrong.

The Lyon County Times, published at Dayton, Nevada, in its issue of December 25 contains the following:

"Some weeks ago the stage running between Independence and the C. & C. station, in Inyo county was robbed of the treasure box containing $2,000. For a time it was thought the robber would not be apprehended, but they have now arrested a young man named Banny, a son of the County Clerk of Inyo county. Young Bunny was in a position to know when the treasure box would be fat with the money, and since the robbery has been spending money very freely.

"The Bunny family were residents of Mason Valley back in the '80's."

This is, in its entirety, a gross, malicious falsehood. Ivan Bunney has not been arrested. He has not been spending money freely. He has never been supected of the crime. At the time when the robbery was committed he was in Rhine's store in company with a number of other boys. He was there when Harper came in and announced that the stage had been robbed. The fact is that Ivan is an industrious and steady boy. There is not a lad of his years in this vicinity who earns more money by his labor. The above statement is cruel and will meet with indignation from every person in this community. It is a serious wrong to the boy and his people. It is pretty well known who originated the falsehood, and the boy's father will, and should hound down the wretch and show him up, if no other satisfaction can be gained.

Wages of employes on the Union Pacific railroad have been reduced, the reduction amounting to about 30 per cent of their former wages.

Emmett Dalton, the only surviving brother of the band of Dalton outlaws, and who was severely wounded while attempting to rob a bank at Coffeyville, Kansas, five years ago, has petitioned the courts for a pardon. It is not likely that his request will be granted.

The Christmas Tree.

Tonight at the Pavili On, Our children will enjoy an old fashioned—Xmas tree. It was intended to have had it last Friday night but it was postponed on account of so much sickness among the little folks. Most of them are well now and we hope they will all be on hand tonight 'cause everybody who goes, big or little, is sure to have a real jolly time. Christmas only comes once in a whole year in California, 'cause Santa Claus has to visit lots and lots of little people all over the world and he only gets out here in mid winter. So on the occasion of his annual visit the children should all turn out and give him a royal welcome, 'cause then the old fellow will know his visits are appreciated, and it will tickle him ever so much. Besides his sled is filled with presents for all the good little boys and girls, an' he's got a great big box o' candy and nuts, and he isn't a wee bit stingy with 'em, either, for he buys 'em on purpose to give to little boys and girls. Tomorrow is New Years, and Christmas won't come again for fifty one long weeks, but if the children are all real good and mind their mammas, he will come again next year and bring lots more presents. So child ren, put

NEWSY NOTES FROM BIG PINE.

BIG PINE, Dec. 29, 1897.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—The hamlet honored the Yuletide in the usual earnest manner so common in this neck of the woods. The exercises at the new church on Christmas were up to the long established stannard of "we 'uns." The music by Miss Mabel Chaltant of the primary department of the district school was excellent, and the song by Miss Lena Warner would rank well in any appreciative section. The chorus by the school showed careful training by the tutor; the recitations were appropriate and well rendered, notably those by Master Kent Ober, Arthur Newman and his sister; the address of welcome by Master Dixon was an entire and complete success.

The Christmas tree was well loaded with mementoes for the little ones. Mr. George Mitchell, in make-up and action, was a record-smashing Santa Claus. Your scribe has seldom seen so happy a concourse of young Americans as was in evidence on the occasion referred to.

After the last kindly act of distribution had been performed by the cunning little "Dutch Saint," the young folks adjourned to meet immediately at Williams hall where they did the perfection of poetic motion until the wee sma' hours.

Some years since the U. S. Indian day school was duly established, and except a brief lapse incident to the loss of the building by fire the school has been running constantly since 1892. At the beginning of the current term, September 1, Mrs. Riter, late of the Round Valley School, Mendocino county, took charge of the little brown braves and brave brown lassies of this school and one of the most interesting incidents of our Christmas celebration was the rendition of the following program:

Welcome Song - - By School
"Ring Out, Sweet Bells," Lonella Yandell
"On this Christmas Morning"
- - - George Gregg
"We Bid Thee Welcome, Holy Child,"
- - - School
"Hark! A Burst of Heavenly Music."
- - - Nettie Paine
Chorus with same by school
"Gallilee," - N. Paine, E. Horton, G. Gregg, V. J. Baker.
Our Christmas Tree - - E. Horton
"See the Neat Little Clock."
- - Little Children
"Roll Your Hands" - Little Children
"Snow Angels," - N. Paine, E. Horton
Child's Prayer - - - School
"Gather Around the Christmas Tree,"
- - - R. J. Baker
Song—"Gather Around the Christmas Tree" - - School

Those who attended the Christmas tree exercises were impressed with the evidences of real improvement plainly illustrated. The recitations and songs were all rendered in an excellent manner. Mrs. Riter informs your correspondent that the Piutes of Big Pine are equal to other Indians taught by her in point of receptive capacity. The exhibition was generously attended by the whites, and they all agree that the Indian school is a success under the efficient management of the present teacher.

Notwithstanding the fact that no "whoop" of previous birth had heralded the celebration of Xmas many of the good people came into the hamlet to exchange greetings of the glad time; much innocent amusement was enjoyed, and "feats of strength went round." One incident closed the drama and the day, to-wit: a hotly contested sprint between Capt. Jim Wallace of the Farrington wood schooner, "Betsy Jane," and an acclimated webfoot from Black canyon, as yet quite unknown to fame. The distance, 75 sober yards, was done by the valiant captain in 7 seconds; at the outcome his competitor was found well in the neighborhood of the home base, some Miles nearer town. The contest was for $1.50 worth of merchandise, which was promptly administered to the winner, accompanied by the loud plaudits of the multitude.

The local sports, prompted by the fraudulent claim of "foul" by the friends of the broad-footed sprinter of Black canyon, are offering to back "Capt. Jim," for much yellow metal from Klondike.

At the regular annual meeting of the management of the Big Pine and Owen's River Canal Co., held here the 28th inst. H. McMurry, J. W. McMurry, J. C. Crocker, A. C. McDonald and Louis Miller were elected directors, R. W. Thomas was re-elected Treasurer and Secretary.

Yours,
SWAMPER.

I. N. McLaughlan, better known to all old timers as "Big Mack," died at Lone Pine on Wednesday and was buried yesterday. The deceased was one of the old pioneer race, so fast passing away. He had a heart as big in proportion as his body, and every man was his friend. He made Inyo county his home for many years, though occasionally he prospected new fields in Colorado and elsewhere. Many an old-timer will mourn the death of "Big Mack," and all his friends of later years will sorrow with them.

Church Notice.

The order of religious services will be as follows until further notice:

Independence—Preaching service every Sunday evening commencing 7 o'clock.

Lone Pine—Every Sunday morning (excepting the last Sunday of each month) commencing at 11 o'clock.

George's Creek's—The first and third Sunday of each month to commence at 2:30 o'clock.

Liberty—The last Sunday of each month to commence at 2 o'clock

All are cordially invited to be present at these services.

THOS. H. NICHOLAS, Pastor.

So great is the dissatisfaction in English mining circles relative to the new Government restrictions regarding explosives that inventors are devising methods for rapid mining without the use of explosives of any kind. One appliance, when placed in a hole drilled as though for blasting powder, can be expanded with such force as to rupture the coal effectively and with trifling waste. The tool in its normal condition is but two and one half inches in diameter, but by an interior combination of wedge and screw can be expanded to three and one-half inches along its entire length. The apparatus is inserted and by forming a screw, the inner part tapered in several stages, slides along correspondingly inclined surfaces inside, thus expanding and exerting enormous pressure until the mass of coal gives way, bringing the coal down quickly without even the use of a hammer.

How to Prevent Pneumonia

At this time of the year a cold is very easily contracted, and if left to run its course without the aid of some reliable cough medicine is liable to result in that dread disease, pneumonia. We know of no better remedy to cure a cough or cold than Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. We have used it quite extensively and it has always given entire satisfaction.—Olagah, Ind. Ter. Chief.

This is the only remedy that is known to be a certain preventive of pneumonia. Among the many thousands who have used it for colds and la grippe we have never yet learned of osingle case having resulted in pneumonia. Persons who have weak lungs or have reason to fear an attack of pneumonia should keep the remedy at hand. The 25 and 50 cent sizes for sale by Nathan Rhine, druggist.

ZEVER AWAKE.

Some people will never wake up till the last horn blows, and then they'll ask if that's the horn for dinner. Delays are dangerous and ruinous. Thousands can say if they hadn't put off an opportunity, they would have been rich and happy. Some never know they have rheumatism until crippled by it, and all the while in pain, thinking it will pass off. But St. Jacob's Oil never delays, and is a wide awake. It goes straight to its work of cure in a business way, and cures rheumatism in any form and at its worst stage. It's a live remedy.

Coffee and Its Uses.

When there are in a community epidemics of typhoid fever, cholera, erysipelas, scarlet fever and the various types of malarial fever, which are transmitted almost entirely through the medium of food and drink, coffee is a valuable agent and may be used as a drink instead of water.

It is a valuable agent in assisting in the digestion of food and aids the blood in taking up more nourishment than it would without it.

It quickens the circulation of the blood and respiration.

It is also stimulating and refreshing (due to the caffeine it contains).

In tiding over nervousness in emergencies it is a sovereign remedy.

As a stimulant and caloric generator in cold weather it is 100 per cent ahead of whisky or other liquors.

As a disinfectant it is one of no small usefulness in the sick chamber.

VALUABLE FRANCHISE SECURED.

The franchise of easy digestion—one of the most valuable in the gift of medical science—can be secured by any person wise enough to use Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, either to suppress growing dyspepsia, or to uproot it at maturity. Bilious, rheumatic and fever and ague sufferers, persons troubled with nervousness and the constipated, should also secure the health franchise by the same means.

REFORMATORIES.

NEW YORK'S SPLENDID INSTITUTION AT ELMIRA.

Exhaustive Report Thereon by Secretary of State L. H. Brown—Some Facts of Interest to All.

During the summer of 1896 Secretray of State L. H. Brown was authorized by the State Board of Examiners to visit a number of reformatory institutions in the East, with a view to reporting to the board the methods employed by the older States in taking care of their criminal element.

The Secretary of State is the Vice-President of the National Prison Association, and takes great interest in the reformation of criminals. A number of the reports on the institutions visited by him have been filed with the Board of Examiners.

Among the reports already on file is that on the New York Reformatory, at Elmira. That institution, Secretary Brown says, is a model of the first class, and in view of the fact that outside of its reform schools for juvenile offenders California has no prison reformatory, the report will prove interesting. Shorn of statistics relative to prices paid for clothing, supplies, etc., the report is as follows:

NEW YORK REFORMATORY.

The New York State Reformatory at Elmira, N. Y., was established in July 1876. Of all the penal reformatories in this country, or any other, this one excels. It is first in moral and physical training, in military discipline and trades teaching. Its several systems for the reformaton and betterment of the criminals are well nigh perfect. Z. R. Brockway, the Superintendent, has but few equals and no superior in his line of work, of which he has made a life study, and the result of his labors at this great reformatory has given him a national reputation, and made him an authority upon penology. He combines qualities rarely found in men; is kind, but firm, keen and very intelligent, and is master of every detail of the work of the institution.

Here are confined 1,420 felons, whose ages average 25 years. Since the opening of the reformatory in 1876, to July 1895, 7,586, inmates were received. Of the number, 6,386 have been paroled or discharged. The average period of detention was twenty-four and three-twelfths months. Here the indeterminate sentence law governs the commitment and release of prisoners. The average term of sentence of those sent to the State prisons for similar crimes to those sent to Elmira is more than five (5) years being three (3) years longer. As the cost to the State for support of an inmate is something like $140 to $150 per annum, one can see at a glance that the law results in a large saving to the State.

Had the definite law been in force there would be twice the number of inmates in the reformatory because there would have been three more years of commitments added to the number already there, owing to their term of sentence being three years longer. A prisoner may, by good behavior, be paroled in one year after becoming an inmate of the reformatory. Nearly 500 are conditionally released in a single year.

During the existence of the parole system, more than 5,000 of those sent here have been paroled, and only 700 discharged by expiration of maximum term. During the same period less than 200 were re-paroled, after being returned to the reformatory and less than 400 recommitted.

Of the present inmates and those received in the past, 55 per cent are of foreign parents, and 45 per cent of natives. In one year, out of 672 men received, more than 600 had no trade.

The annual cost for maintenance, deducting income from sales of products, is $200,000. The cost per capita per annum is $150.38 or 41 2-10 cents per day. It costs to keep a convict in the English prisons $206.18 per annum or 56 4-10 cents per day. The annual pay-roll for salaries is about $40,000. In addition, about $20,000 per annum is expended for physical and technological training.

Much attention is given to improving the physical condition of the prisoners. There is a splendid equipped gymnasium, large enough for 100 prisoners at one time under the charge of a competent instructor, and also under the directions of a physician. The special daily manual training is an attempt to cure specific, mental and moral perversions; to restore deficiencies and to adjust and balance the functions of the mind, believing by cultivating the activity of a certain part of the body a better condition of affairs in the brain is produced. Adjacent to the gymnasium are excellent baths, consisting of large swimming tanks, various showers, etc.

A more complete bathing establishment and gymnasium is seldom seen. The military training is equal to that of a well-governed military school. The discipline enforced, military or otherwise, is remarkable, denoting years of study and experience. It is a fact that this reformatory, which to all outward appearances resembles a penitentiary, is conducted in a scientific manner in the moral, mental and physical development of its inmates. Here are schools of different classes and grades, and those attending are required to reach a certain average. Failing in this means a loss of one month's earned credits. Written examinations are held monthly. Each prisoner attends school two evenings in a week. Free labor is employed in teaching the trades and the same in the schools.

It is estimated that 50 per cent of those discharged return to prison, and but 20 per cent of those paroled commit crime again. In one year a convict may gain sufficient knowledge of a trade with which to earn a livelihood upon being released. They are sent here for the first offense in felony, if known to the magistrate to be such. For the second, to the State's Prison. It is estimated that 40 per cent of those sent to this institution have come in contact with the courts, and have been imprisoned in County Jails. There are three divisions of prisoners. The second grade, the upper grade first, and the upper grade second. In grade second they are charged 25 cents per day for board, in upper first, 23 cents, and lower first, 40 cents.

In addition, they are charged with clothing and whatever else they may use. On entering, a complete outfit is furnished them. Each one is credited daily with from 45 to 70 cents, according to grade and military rank. Fines are charged against their monied credits; punishment or loss of time credits being regulated according to the offense against discipline. If a prisoner has any money to his credit when released, it is given him.

DETAILS OF THE SYSTEM.

On entering the reformatory the prisoners' clothing is taken from him, he goes through a thorough cleansing, his hair is closely cropped and a careful inspection is made of his body, to note any physical ailments, or deformities, and to discover marks that would assist in identification, if necessary. Each convict is given a complete outfit of clothing, together with necessary cell furniture, and thenceforth he is put upon his own resources. The clothing consists of a cheviot jacket, cut in fatigue style, with a row of nickel-plated buttons at the front; two pairs of trousers; one for shop wear and one for drills, school exercises, etc.; a vest made of gray diagonal cloth, same as the pants, a cap of the same color and material; two suits of underwear, two pairs of hose, a pair of low-cut shoes, a black cotton necktie, and a red cotton handkerchief. He is also furnished for use in the cell two pairs of sheets, two pillow cases and two towels, tin cup, tea cups and basin, a pewter tablespoon a glass jar for molases, a cup for salt, blacking brush and blacking, a hair brush and comb and a small mirror.

In the cell there is an iron bedstead with straw filled mattress and pillow, a double and single blanket with chair, a hinged wall table, a hanging wall closet and a night pail. The prisoner is placed in the lower first or neutral grade and he is paid for every full day's work of eight hours at the rate of 45 cents per day. He may add to this by performing more than the required task. For shortage in task a loss on the same basis is incurred. He must pass an exmination equal to a marking of at least 75 per cent during his term whether being instructed or employed in production. For failing of an examination he is fined from $1 to $3, according to the loss in the percentage.

He may also incur losses through fines for bad or poor work, carelessness, wastefulness, for each of which offense a fine of 30 cents is imposed. He is charged for his board, room and washing 30 cents a day, in the lower first grade. The charge for the upper-first grade is 40 cents per day. The rooms are better and also the diet. The convict may advance or retrograde; he commences as mentioned above in lower first grade and may advance to the upper first grade or backwards to the second grade.

In the second grade the charge for board, etc., is 25 cents per diem, but the diet is restricted and the rooms are not so good as in the other two grades. For his outfit clothing, etc., upon entering no charge is made, but when any part of said outfit is required to replace what was first given, he is obliged to purchase them.

By good conduct a prisoner after six months may earn his promotion to the upper grade; for bad conduct he may be reduced to the second or lowest grade. After six consecutive months of good behavior in the upper first grade he is entitled to his release on parole. He is not under any circumstances paroled under one year's residence at the reformatory, for he is kept in the grade he enters six months, and same length of time in the grade he is paroled from. After six months' satisfactory conduct while on parole, the convict is entitled to his freedom. To maintain his standing in grade, the prisoner must maintain a credit balance to his account, and as a condition to his release on parole he must have accumulated sufficient money to carry him to his destination and defray his expenses until he receives his first wages; in a few cases exceptions are made, for obvious reasons.

A few hours after the inmate's admission, he is taken before the General Superintendent, where he is subjected to a searching examination of his whole history; he is questioned closely as to his parentage, youthful environment, employment, habits, ambitions; whether he has been arrested for minor crimes (it must not be forgotten that all criminals sent to Elmira Reformatory are felons), whether any of his ancestors had been criminals or afflicted with insanity, or epilepsy, and what was their vocation.

The examination is one of considerable latitude, and at its termination the Superintendent is better able to judge as to the mental capacity, moral susceptibility, and the technical training required. The convict is given instructions by the Superintendent, in detail, as to the system in rogue, with the privileges and restrictions and penalties, in fact all the workings of the reformatory are outlined to him.

Instructions are given in the primary, elementary and academic branches of learning. Instruction is given in thirty-four different trades, and during one year, of the 452 convicts paroled, 78 per cent obtained employment in the trades learned in the reformatory. The trade schools not only instruct and occupy the inmates, but they are a source of revenue, for during a single year they neted the State, over cost of material, etc., $53,000. The convicts manifest considerable interest in acquiring a trade, and seem to realize the great benefit of one.

The discipline at all times is very strictly enforced, and in no prison or reformatory can be found better order. Every able-bodied convict is required to drill daily. The military is organized into a regiment of four battalions, each consisting of four companies, with a staff and officers. Dress parade is held daily, and regimental drills twice a week. The men are armed with dummy guns, weighing five or six pounds.

The following trades are taught: Baking, barbering, bookbinding, brass-finishing, brass-molding, bricklaying, cabinet making, carpentry, cooking, frescoing, hardwood finishing, horse-shoeing, iron-molding, machinists, photography and etching, plastering, plumbing, printing, stenography, stone-cutting, tailoring, tinsmithing, wood-carving and wood-molding. The prisoners in the upper first grade eat their meals in a large dining-room, while those in the other two grades eat in their cells.

In the upper grade the clothing worn by the prisoners is a uniform of sky blue, and those of the lower grade wear a garb of bright red; they have no sheets on their beds, receive no tea or coffee, are denied the use of the library, and labor in the shops, without any instruction in learning a trade, nor are they permitted to communicate with the outside world. To emerge from this grade a convict is required to earn a perfect marking for three consecutive months. The time of the inmates is fully occupied during working hours and the occupations are varied. They are awakened daily, except Sundays, at 5:45 a. m. One hour is given for their morning toilet, cleansing their cells and eating breakfast. At 6:45 lines are formed, and the prisoners are marched to their several occupations, and at 7 o'clock the work of the day begins. One hour intermission is given at noon; at 4:15 p. m. all assemble on the parade. At 5 is the supper hour.

On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings, school meetings are held from 6:30 to 8, and between 8 and 9:30 (at which later hour lights are out), they are permitted to study or read in their cells. Those who perform domestic labor, or exercise in the gymnasium in the morning, receive a trades instruction in the afternoon. Upon Wednesday and Saturday afternoon work is suspended and four hours are devoted to drilling and military tactics.

On Saturday the chorus choir of 400 voices rehearse. Lectures on ethics and moral philosophy are held on Sunday for those in two grades, with religious services for all in the evening. A very minute account is kept of every man's behavior, his work and school proficiency. A debit and credit account of marks are kept, and at the end of each month a complete record is sent to each prisoner, which includes the conduct, school markings, earnings or losses, etc.

The Board of Managers sit as a Parole Court four times a year. Notice of such meetings is given to the convicts, and all those eligible to parole are called before the board. Parole is granted upon the record of the convict in the institution, his general appearance and manner, and on the recommendation of the General Superintendent. No convict is permitted to go out on parole without money or employment.

THE PAROLE.

When an inmate obtains his release on parole he is provided with a new suit of clothes and receives sufficient funds to reach his destination and pay his immediate expenses. An interview is then granted him by the General Superintendent, who gives him some practical advice with respect to his duties and presents him with his parole papers. The document practically permits him to go at liberty under certain conditions and restraints mentioned in the papers.

Upon their release on parole inmates are requested to "proceed directly to the place of employment" provided for them, and "there remain, if practicable, for at least six months" from the date of issuance of parole papers. When arrived at their destination they must report to the guardian specially selected for the purpose—in most cases the New York Association, otherwise some leading citizen of the town—furnish particulars as to place of employment and of residence. They must also communicate with the General Superintendent, announcing their arrival.

On the first day of every month, for a period of six months or more, and until absolutely released by the managers, they must present themselves at the office of their temporary guardian and hand in a statement of their conduct, to be forwarded to the reformatory authorities. The account, duly certified by their employer, must state whether they have been "constantly under pay during the month, and if not to furnish the reason therefor, and also make known the amounts of money they have expended and laid aside," together with a general and full statement of themselves and surroundings. A systematic record is kept of all men paroled from the institution, with minutes of their correspondence and of the guardian's private reports.

Whenever an ex-prisoner, conditionally released, is found derelict in complying with the conditions of his parole an investigation is set on foot, and if the reports are unsatisfactory a warrant is issued for the apprehension and return of the delinquent. Paroled men who, "through misfortune or inability," lose their position and voluntarily return to the institution with the advice and consent of the management, are received as guests, waiting the procurement of a new situation.

Chinese Money.

A kind of Chinese money which is largely manufactured and sold is worthy of mention, although the traveler need not trouble himself with it except as a curiosity. This is prepared for the special purpose of burning at the graves of deceased relatives as an offering to the dead. The denizens of the other world are supposed to require and to be capable of receiving money in this way, but the Chinaman is far too practical a person to part in such a fashion with the currency of the empire. Instead he buys for a few cash a large supply of silvered and gilded pieces of paper or of imitation coins blocked out of cardboard.

Although these have no purchasing power on earth, they are supposed to count for much in the transactions of the spirit world. By this practice one is reminded of an old story of a miser who left his belongings to his son on condition that a certain sum of money should be buried in the coffin with him. The son was, however, a chip of the old block and carried out his father's wishes by placing in the coffin a crossed check for the required amount, assured that it had little chance of being presented at his banker's.—Chambers' Journal.

Glass bricks are made extensively in Germany. They are blown with a hollow center, containing rarefied air, and they are said to be as strong and durable as clay bricks. They freely admit light.

QUEER LAKE SALAWIK.

Its Waters Grow Warm In Winter, and Men Can Fish There With Clubs.

The rich placers of Klondike are not the only curiosity of the country traversed by the Yukon. Not far from Dawson there is in Alaska a really extraordinary lake which was named Salawik by its discoverer, the Rev. P. Tosi, a missionary among the savages.

This lake, which is 90 miles long and about 15 miles wide, is perhaps the only one in all that extreme northern region which does not freeze over during the winter. No communication has been discovered between it and the sea, nevertheless at high water upon the coasts of the northern ocean the level of the lake rises, and it falls again at low tide.

This sympathy with the sea does not extend to the point of making Salawik a salt lake. On the contrary, its waters are good to drink. But another of its peculiarities is that its temperature rises in winter and falls in summer. When all the water courses of the neighboring country are completely frozen over, Lake Salawik becomes so warm that it is really pleasant to bathe in it. On the other hand, in the summer time the water is extremely cold.

This peculiarity makes it in the winter time a Mecca of fishermen. The abundance of fish in the lake is so great that a person can almost catch them with the hand and can kill large quantities with a club. Here for the miners is a source of food supply which they had not counted upon and which certainly will contribute to diminish the cost of living, especially during the winter, in that inhospitable region. In an hour a man can get enough fish to supply himself for a month, and of the very best quality, including salmon ranging from 20 to 50 pounds in weight.

It will not be astonishing if some fine day we may see upon the shores of Lake Salawik one of those fashionable hotels which are the glory of American watering places.—Lewiston (Me.) Republique.

ABSINTH IN FRANCE.

Taking a Glass of the Liquor Is a Whole Evening's Work.

Although absinth is to a Frenchman what whisky is to an American, he never dreams of running behind a screen and swallowing a glassful in one tremendous effort. There is something almost poetic in the way a Frenchman prepares and partakes of his beverage.

It always takes two waiters to serve a glass of absinth. Waiter No. 1 brings the tray, upon which are a carafe frappe (ice water that has been frozen in the carafe), a tall glass, a tiny tray piled up with small blocks of sugar and a queer, flat, perforated spoon. Waiter No. 2, who has remained discreetly in the rear, advances with the bottle of the popular stimulant said to be the destruction of so many French minds and bodies. After saluting monsieur, the garcon carefully pours the desired quantity into the glass and goes on to serve some one else.

Then for the first time the Frenchman shows some signs of interest in the matter. He relinquishes his hold on his cane, but one hand only; the other never deserts the cane. He carefully places the perforated spoon across the top of the glass. On the spoon he balances, with careful nicety, a block of sugar and gently pours a small quantity of ice water over the sugar into the glass. This done, he once more grasps his cane with both hands and apparently forgets all about the beverage before him. The sugar slowly melts, drop by drop, into the glass, through the perforations of the spoon. Quite awhile afterward, sometimes a half an hour, the drinker again shows an interest in his beverage. He looks to see if the sugar has all melted; then he removes the spoon and raises the glass for a sip of the concoction—only a sip, however—for it is sip by sip that a Frenchman consumes his absinth, and a glass of it, including the time passed in the preparation, takes an entire evening.—Chicago Tribune.

An Ancient Prayer.

Old John Ward, who was pilloried by Pope in the "Dunciad," and who actually stood in the pillory in the year 1727, when he was said to have been worth £200,000, was, nevertheless, a pious man. He had large estates in London and Essex and did not omit to pray for their welfare in the following manner: "O Lord, I beseech thee to preserve the two counties of Middlesex and Essex from fire and earthquake, and as I have a mortgage in Hertfordshire I beg of thee likewise to have an eye of compassion on that county, and for the rest of the counties deal with them as thou pleasest!"—Household Words.

A HEALTHY WIFE

Is a Husband's Inspiration.

A sickly, half-dead-and-alive woman, especially when she is the mother of a family, is a damper to all joyousness in the home.

If a woman finds that her energies are flagging and that everything tires her, her sleep is disturbed by horrible dreams, and that she often wakes suddenly in the night with a feeling of suffocation and alarm, she must at once regain her strength.

The following from MRS. F. S. BENNETT, Westphalia, Kans., shows the power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and a letter of advice:

"Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—I have suffered for over two years with falling, enlargement and ulceration of the womb, and this spring, being in such a weakened condition, caused me to flow for nearly six months. Some time ago, urged by friends, I wrote to you for advice. After using the treatment which you advised for a short time, that terrible flow stopped. I am now gaining strength and flesh and have better health than I have had for the past ten years."

Kidney and Bladder Troubles Quickly Cured.

You May Have a Sample Bottle of the Great Discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root Sent Free by Mail.

People doctor their troubles and try different medicines so often without benefit that they get discouraged and skeptical. In most such cases serious mistakes are made in doctoring and not knowing what our trouble is or what makes us sick. The unmistakable evidences of kidney trouble are pain or dull ache in the back, too frequent desire to pass water, scanty supply, scalding irritation. As kidney disease advances the face looks sallow or pale, eyes puffy, the feet swell and sometimes the heart aches badly. Should further evidence be needed to find out the cause of sickness, then set urine aside for twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling is also convincing proof that our kidneys and bladder need doctoring.

The mild and extraordinary effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures. Sold by druggists, price fifty cents and one dollar. So universally successful has Swamp-Root been in quickly curing even the most distressing cases that if you wish to Prove its wonderful merit you may have a sample bottle and a book of valuable information, both sent absolutely free by mail. Mention this paper and send your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghampton, N. Y. The fact that this liberal offer appears in this paper is sufficient guarantee.

HUMAN BRAINS.

How Science Views the Difference Between Men and Women.

The weightier brain would seem also to indicate, a priori, the greater intellectual power, and this, too, is borne out by undoubted facts. Women, it has often been said, have yet to produce their Newton, their Dante, their Aristotle, their Pascal, their Goethe. The assertion is very feebly met by the contention that women's education has been for centuries neglected.

It was not education which enabled Pascal as a child to see his way through problems which not one man in 1,000 can understand after prolonged mental drill. It was not education which gave the race its great men poets. "They lisped in numbers for the numbers came." But where are their feminine equals? We will, however, take an art in which women have enjoyed far more training than men—the art of music. There are some excellent women pianists and violinists, but where are the female Bachs, Beethovens, Mozarts and Wagners? Nature only can explain the absence of great women composers as of the feminine compeers of Titian and Raphael, the technique of whose art seems peculiarly fitted to women.

Nature tells us that she cannot form the matrix out of which commanding intellectual geniuses of the female sex would proceed. Why this is so we may partly guess, but cannot wholly know. We see that nature has divided the world into sexes for her own purposes, and that to each sex peculiar functions are assigned. We see that the physiological functions of woman necessitate a different anatomy from that of man, and we infer that these functions and this structure preclude, speaking generally, the kind of effort which we call supreme genius, as also that kind of effort which we call sustained executive power. While women are not so far differentiated from men that they cannot enter with pleasure into men's works, and, often in a great measure, share in their production, it remains a fact that it is man's particular organization which is alone capable either of the highest manifestations of genius or the most sustained exhibition of energy. Whether it will always be so we do not know, for we cannot peer into the future. It is sufficient that it not only is so now, but that it always has been so, and that science does give us some good grounds for believing that the fact is deeply rooted in the very structure of sex.—London Spectator.

THE HEALTHY PALATE.

It Does Not Crave Condiments, but the Food Must Possess Flavor.

While a perfectly sound and healthy palate does not crave for condiments, even prefers to do without them, yet the majority of digestions require to be humored and kept in order, and their peculiarities must be studied. Dr. Brunton says:

"Savory food causes the digestive juices to be freely secreted. Well cooked and palatable food is therefore more digestible than the unpalatable. If food lacks savor, a desire naturally arises to supply it by condiments, not always well selected or wholesome."

As commerce brought them within reach of the people condiments, in simple or complicated forms, came greatly into favor, and foreign spices were added to the wild herbal growths of the fields and hedges. In our early history the "spicery" was a special department of the court and had its proper officers.

In the fourteenth century spices were both costly and rare, most of them coming from the Levant. Chaucer mentions many by name—canella, macys, clowes (cloves), grains of paradise, nutmegs, caraway and spikenard. The ancients, especially the Greeks and Romans in the luxurious period of their history, used condiments very freely.

An old English historian, referring to the earlier Roman court, says, "The best magistrates of Rome allowed but the ninth day for the city and publick business, the rest for the country and the sallet garden." From this it would seem as though the education of taste was accounted of some consequence in those days.—Exchange.

"Professors."

The misuse of the title "professor," when it is applied indiscriminately to musicians in general, finds an amusing example in the following story, credited to Bandmaster Sousa and printed in The Musical Age:

Some years ago Sousa was leading a band at a small country festival. The advent of the band had been awaited with intense interest by the audience, and when they arrived the bandsmen were quickly surrounded by a surging crowd which hemmed them in so that it was difficult for them to keep on playing.

Sousa appealed to one of the committee to keep the crowd away and said that unless his men had more room they could not play. The committeeman shook his hand warmly, and, turning to the asembled multitude, bawled out:

"Gentlemen, step back and give the purfesser's purfessers a chance to play!"
